THE TARIFF.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 4413, the free-list bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the free-list bill, with Mr. ALEXANDER in the chair.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL]. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I listened with a great deal of interest to the eloquent speech of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] closing the debate on the Canadian reciprocity bill, in which he declared it to be the policy of the Democratic Party to levy customs duties for revenue purposes only and referred to the policy of protection as "a dead and unnecessary economic system that creates false standards," without which, in his opinion, "we would be universal masters of production and industry in every land where free competition could be obtained." Having thus declared his opposition to the protective system and the intention of his party to destroy it, he proceeded to pay a most eloquent tribute to the splendid victories of our protected industries in the following language:

Our agricultural implements supply the farmers' wants beyond the seas. Our boots and shoes are worn by people who speak many foreign languages and who tread the highways of the Occident and the Orient. The looms of our factories clothe the people of distant lands. The freight of our foreign rivals is carried to market on American rails, drawn by American engines across chasms spanned by American-built bridges.

It seems not to have occurred to the gifted leader of the majority that his denunciation of the protective policy, which he reminded us our party had maintained for 50 years, sounded strangely illogical and incongruous uttered in the same breath with his tribute to the magnificent conquest we have made of foreign markets under that system.

Perhaps we should not expect the gentlemen on the other side to be either logical or consistent in their discussions of tariff questions. They have gotten so accustomed to substituting theory for fact, declamation for logic, in the years they have wandered in the wilderness as a minority that they can scarcely be expected to become entirely practical and logical immediately on being confronted with responsibility.

Had the gentleman from Alabama been describing, not the glorious condition of American trade and commerce after 50 years of protection, but its condition at the beginning of that period, his language would have been far different. To paint a faithful picture he would then have been compelled to say something like this:

No agricultural implements fashioned by our artisans till the soil or harvest the crops of any foreign land; no foreign tongues speak the virtues or foreign highways resound with the tread of American-made shoes; the products of our looms are unknown to the markets of the world; a few American locomotives wake the echoes of the hills of Europe, but they only serve to haul over English rails to the seaports of our commercial rivals' foreign goods for export to swell the trade balance of the world against us. On the contrary, our fields are largely tilled and our harvests gathered with implements of foreign manufacture; many of our people wear boots and shoes of foreign make. In the main, only the coarsest and cheapest of the cloths we use and wear are the product of American looms. Our railways are built with English shovels and laid with English rails and are largely occupied in transporting through the land the products of European mills and factories.

What a blessed thing it is for the gentleman from Alabama that 50 years of protective tariff has enabled him to paint so glorious a word picture as he has of the triumph of American industry and saved him from the painful necessity of repeating the doleful tale of depression and disaster which was told in a message to Congress by the last Democratic President who preceded the inauguration of the era of protection. Mr. Buchanan, speaking of those good old Democratic revenue tariff times, said:

In the midst of unsurpassed plenty in all of the productions of agriculture and in all the elements of national wealth we find our manufactures suspended, our public works retarded, our private enterprises of different kinds abandoned, and thousands of useful laborers thrown out of employment and reduced to want. The revenue of the Government, which is chiefly derived from duties on imports from abroad, has been greatly reduced, whilst the appropriations made by Congress at its last session for the current fiscal year are very large in amount.

And this is the happy condition of affairs to which the gentleman from Alabama apparently desires to return. I have no doubt but what he and his party will produce a most excellent imitation of those conditions in a very brief space of time if they have an opportunity to write their tariff views into law.

FARMERS' FREE LIST.

The measure before us is widely heralded as the farmers' free-list bill. It proposes to put on the free list agricultural implements, bagging and burlap, cotton ties, heavy leather, boots and shoes made from cattle hides, harness, saddles, barbed wire, fresh and salt meats, flour and certain products thereof, timber and lumber, sewing machines, and salt. It is intended to be a sop to the farmers to recompense them for their losses under the Canadian reciprocity bill, and is expected to have a quieting effect on the nerves of the gentlemen on the Democratic side who, as stated by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], "are shaking in their boots because of their vote for the Canadian reciprocity measure."

DEMOCRATIC ESTIMATE OF FARMER.

I fear our Democratic friends have formed their estimate of the American farmer from stories they have read in comic journals of "hayseeds from way back" who have purchased gold bricks. Whether any real American farmer ever bought a gold brick I do not know. I have never known one who did; but certain it is that this is the first time that a great political party has ever attempted to hand the farmers en masse a legislative gold brick. [Applause on the Republican side.] But I have not been so much surprised at this since I listened to the estimate of the American farmer, voiced by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], when he lapsed into poetry in his speech the other day and referred to the American farmer as one who has "the emptiness of ages in his face." That may possibly be the kind of farmers they have in the gentleman's district, at least we have his word for it; but it is not the kind of farmers that we on this side of the Chamber are acquainted with. That the Democratic majority accepts the definition of the gentleman from Kentucky of the American farmer as one who has "the emptiness of ages in his face" is evidenced by their attempt to make him believe that the bill they have presented for our consideration will prove beneficial to him. Are the gentlemen attempting to transfer the emptiness which they profess to see in the farmer's face to his pocketbook and his stomach? [Applause on the Republican side.]

BURDEN OF THE WORLD.

The gentleman from Kentucky, who is ordinarily anything but poetic, though he sometimes indulges in poetic license, in the enthusiasm of his speech the other day lapsed still further into poetry touching the American farmer and referred to him as one who has "on his back the burden of the world." The gentleman is evidently still troubled with the haunting memory of those dreadful days under the Wilson bill when the American farmer had the burden of the world upon his back in the shape of the Democratic Party.

I am not surprised that the gentleman from Kentucky, while attempting to convince the American farmer of what his party proposes to do for him, should have lapsed into poetry as he, shuddering, recalled what they did to him the last time they amended the tariff laws of the country.

Those were such fearsome days that we would fain blot them from our memory forever, and would do so if it were not for the fact that the temporarily triumphant Democracy, unrepentant of its faults and uncured of its errors, recalls them to us in the haunting poetry of the gentleman from Kentucky. As they insist upon our doing so, perhaps it will not be altogether labor lost to recall that when the Democratic Party won its victory in 1894, and proceeded to put the Wilson bill upon the statute books of the Nation, the farmers of the United States owned in round numbers 47,000,000 head of sheep, valued at $124,000,000, and, before they had an opportunity to return the party of protection to power and repeal that calamitous legislation, the number of their sheep had dwindled to 36,000,000 and their value to $67,000,000, a loss to the sheep owners of the country of $55,000,000, to which must be added the loss of about $20,000,000 in wool clip of four years, making a total loss of over $100,000,000 to the sheep and wool growers of the country. In three years under the Wilson bill the value of the horses on the farms of the United States decreased from $992,000,000 to $453,000,000, or a loss of $539,000,000. Even the Missouri mule, tough as he is, was crushed under the burden of the Democratic Party; his tribe decreased in numbers over 200,000 and his value over $72,000,000 in that short period of Democratic control. And yet the gentleman from Kentucky has the effrontery to claim the virtues of the mule for his party. We have always understood that his party had all the other characteristics of that noble animal. [Applause on the Republican side.] The decrease in the value of stock cattle in the period referred to above was over $39,000,000, and altogether the American farmer and stockman lost, in live stock alone the last time the Democratic Party attempted to do something for him, over $800,000,000. No wonder the gentleman from Kentucky refers to it feelingly as the "burden of the world."

But the farmer's loss in live stock during the last period of Democratic tariff tinkering was but a small portion of his aggregate loss, for as the factory doors closed and the family savings dwindled and disappeared and care and want clouded the faces and pinched the cheeks of the mothers and children 4,000,000 stalwart American workingmen, in the words of a great labor leader—went up and down the highways and byways of the land seeking work and finding it not.

The farmer, suffering the loss of his markets, forced to sell his produce below the price of production, began to fear the mortgage, the proceeds of which he had used to improve his farm and home; then the same party that had despoiled him came to him with a weird tale of financial legerdemain warranted to rescue him from the condition in which the mischievous policies of the party had plunged him, but he had quite enough of Democratic theory by that time, and, as Kipling says, "that is another story"—a story told in the triumphant election of McKinley and the return to power of the party of sound industrial policy and sound finance. [Applause on the Republican side.]

A SECTIONAL BILL.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] in his speech the other day grew quite sarcastic in his denunciation of what he was pleased to call an attempt on the part of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] to arouse "sectionalism" in connection with the consideration of this bill, and yet, in his attempt to explain that the bill was not sectional in its pretended benefits, he entirely forgot or overlooked the fact that of the estimated reduction in import duties which would result from the enactment of the legislation on the basis of last year's importations, amounting in all to $8,375,676, according to the statement contained in the report on the bill, $6,877,667 was duty on cotton bagging, burlap, and so forth, which, it is stated in the same report, on page 5, is "chiefly used for the covering of cotton."

Of course it is not true that the cotton planter would, under the provisions of the bill, receive anything like that amount of relief in the lower price of bagging for his cotton. I doubt if he would obtain his cotton bagging in the long run any cheaper; but accepting, for the sake of argument, the claim made by the gentleman on the other side that the amount of duty now paid on the articles which it is proposed to place on the free list would all be distributed among the users of these articles, then the cotton producer would receive 82 per cent of all of the benefits of the legislation. If this is not sectional legislation, then the gentleman will have to invent some other name for it. It is not only sectional, but according to the claims advanced for the legislation by its friends and sponsors its benefits go almost entirely to one industry of one section.

If the Democratic majority really want to be relieved from the charge of sectionalism and do something for the farmers and those classes of people to whom the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] refers as "those to whom the necessities of life mean so much," why do not they put sugar and rice on the free list? Why do they not do something for the poor boys of the country by putting peanuts on the free list? If their claim of solicitude for the people is anything more than a hollow mockery and a sham and they want to treat all sections of the country alike, why do they not put articles on the free list the price of which will be reduced by their action? This free list of theirs will not reduce the price of a single American product to any American citizen. The free list I suggest would unquestionably reduce the price of commodities of general consumption.

BLOW TO THE PROTECTIVE SYSTEM.

This measure is frankly intended as a blow to the protective system [applause on the Democratic side], so announced by its friends and supporters on the other side, all of whom seem to have now arrayed themselves either under the banner of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], who declares for a tariff for revenue only, or under the banner of the gentleman from New York [Mr. GEORGE], who, not having been coached in the school of caution, has boldly announced himself what others on that side are too cautious to profess, a free trader.

It is exceedingly fortunate for the country and for this side of the House which, though temporarily in the minority, is still the safeguard and defender of American labor and industries, of American standards and ideals [applause on the Republican side], that the lines are thus clearly drawn, and that we know that it is not a question of what might be properly or safely or wisely done with regard to any particular item if presented as a part of a general tariff revision, but whether or not the Republican minority on this side of the House, representing that political faith and those economic principles under which we have had the most phenomenal development and the most widely and generally diffused prosperity ever known in the history of the world, shall open the gates of the citadel of prosperity to the Trojan horse of free trade and be deceived by the ancient enemy, the "tariff for revenue" Greeks, claiming to bear gifts.

THE LESSON OF EXPERIENCE.

It is an unfortunate fact that there are some things which each generation of men must learn for themselves, oftentimes through bitter experience. It was a wise matron who once said "The way to reach some men's hearts is through their stomachs." It seems to be equally true that that is the only way to reach some people's heads. The Democratic Party is and always has been the party of opportunism. Its opportunity has generally come through public disaster. Sometimes its opportunity has arrived through the almost universal human longing to eat one's cake and still retain it on the pantry shelf. I sometimes think that nothing but disastrous experience will bring some people to realize that it is the part of wisdom to cling to the good things we have and endeavor to make them better, rather than to recklessly cast them aside in the hope of capturing a bauble temptingly dangled before our gaze by political slight-of-hand performers.

CAUSES OF DEMOCRATIC VICTORY.

The gentlemen on the other side of the House have deluded themselves into believing that their temporary majority over there represents a repudiation by the American people of the policy of protection. Never was a political majority more profoundly mistaken, and the rudeness and shock of their coming awakening will be as profound as the depth of their present delusion.

The gentlemen on the other side owe their majority to the natural accretion of minor grouches and grievances accumulating through 16 years of responsibility on this side; to the effect of some mistakes of a minor character, which are inevitable in a long lease of power; to some considerable temporary disagreement and dissension among ourselves, part of which arose over matters of policy and more through personal ambitions; to the rather undefined and indefinable feeling of unrest and desire for a change which ever so often prevades the body politic; to the fact that for reasons we were in no way responsible for except that prosperity brings high prices, the cost of living as Americans desire to live was high; to the fact that our progressive legislation regulating railroads and along other lines gave the Democrats the support of certain powerful special interests. All these exaggerated, intensified, and fomented by a powerful press, sympathizing somewhat with the disturbing forces, but more largely actuated by a determination to have its way with regard to at least one schedule of the tariff—that which affects the product which is the raw material of their trade. And out of this has come a majority on the other side, which is temporarily deluding itself into the belief that the American people, who have had a longer and more successful experience with a protective tariff than any other people, and who have established and maintained under it more satisfactory conditions than have ever been enjoyed by any other people who have ever inhabited the globe, are prepared to turn their backs upon the policy which all of our commercial rivals claim, and we ourselves know, has been responsible to a greater extent than anything else for the temporal blessings which we as a people enjoy.

FREE TRADE VERSUS PROTECTION.

I love a free trader, or a tariff-for-revenue man—which is the same thing under another name—individually and personally. They are such optimistic people with regard to their particular lunacy. They are so childlike in their persistent ignoring of the laws of trade and the lessons of experience. However pessimistic they may be with regard to the other affairs of life; however wise, discreet, or profound they may be with regard to other matters, on this one proposition they illustrate better than any people I have ever met the saying that "Where ignorance is bliss 'tis folly to be wise." If they alone were to suffer for their blissful ignorance, I should be the last to deny them the pleasure of its enjoyment; but unfortunately for us, fortunately for them, they can not bring upon themselves the fruits of their folly without involving us all in the common catastrophe.

SHEEP AND WOOL FROM CANADA.

We had a beautiful illustration in the House the other day of that delightful condition of innocence of knowledge which leads men to blindly pursue economic heresies without regard to consequences. During the reading of the Canadian reciprocity bill for amendment, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] offered a very sensible amendment and explained its purpose, which was to prevent the driving of sheep across the Canadian border to be shorn on the American side and then driven back and the wool sold here, thus securing our market without paying our duty of 11 cents a pound. The vociferous jeers which greeted this amendment and its explanation would have really been funny, if it were not for the fact that they brought vividly to mind the dangers to which American industries are now exposed.

Of course, the gentlemen who joined in these jeers do not know—I suppose they ought not to be expected to know—that there are in the United States over 25,000,000 head of sheep, which are bred and grazed on the open range in large flocks, which are constantly on the move; whose summer and winter ranges and lambing and shearing grounds are oftentimes separated by 50, 75, 100, and 150 miles. There is no difficulty whatever and no appreciable additional expense in moving such flocks 50 or 100 miles or more to shear. Ten millions or more of such sheep occupy the territory immediately contiguous to the Canadian line, west of the Great Lakes, in a region having similar climatic conditions to those of the adjacent regions of Canada. It does not pay under free wool to raise sheep in Alberta, Saskatchewan, and British Columbia, but the Canadian reciprocity bill allows the free importation of sheep from Canada into the United States, and under that provision the sheep business along the Canadian border for 1,500 miles can be carried on just as it is in the same territory south of the line, and sheep grazing within 100 miles or more of the border can without difficulty or considerable expense be driven over the line into the United States, shorn, and the wool enter our markets without the payment of duty.

The duty on this class of wool is 11 cents a pound, and about 7½ pounds per head is the average clip per sheep in that region. That means a saving in duty of over 80 cents on the fleece of each sheep, and who is bold enough to say that with the American market for Canadian mutton, with a saving in duty of 80 cents on each animal per annum, the next few years will not see at least 10,000,000 sheep along the border in Canada?

I am not a prophet; I am not prophesying that this will occur, but I know of no reason why it should not. It is one of the probable effects of the passage of the Canadian reciprocity bill. The loss to our Treasury on the fleeces of that number of sheep would be $8,000,000, to say nothing of the loss to the American farmer by having that quantity of wool, duty free, brought into competition with his production. And yet, in the face of the probability—the certainty, to an extent at least—of the very operation to which I have referred, the very proper and reasonable amendment of the gentleman from Washington met only the jeers of ignorance on that side. [Applause on the Republican side.] What assurance have we that the same lack of knowledge which exists on that side with regard to the effect of that legislation does not exist with regard to the effect of this and other legislation which will be proposed here having to do with the multiplied industries of a great people? The trouble with the free trader and the tariff-for-revenue advocate is, as I have pointed out, he goes blindly in ignorance or in defiance of the facts which control the commerce and industry of the world.

WAR APPROPRIATIONS.

We are spending this year upon our Army and Navy and fortifications over $250,000,000. Why this enormous outlay? Are not all the people of the earth our friends, our brethren? Are we not peaceably disposed toward all; and is it not our duty to take it for granted they are peaceably disposed toward us? Why, then, this waste of treasure? Why this burdening of the people with the cost of military establishments, upon which we have expended over $2,000,000,000 in the last 10 years?

I take it that this expenditure is for defense. Against what? Against the ambitions and encroachments of foreign powers; and the gentlemen on that side, free trader and tariff-for-revenue man alike, voted for these enormous outlays, and some, like the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON], would have largely increased them. And yet, while gentlemen are so suspicious of foreign peoples that our coast lines must bristle with 13-inch guns and our leviathans of war churn the waters of every sea, they can not understand that there is any reason for defense against the infinitely more active and insidious commercial ambitions of other nations. While insisting in taxing our people to maintain armaments to ward off political ambitions, they propose to throw our ports wide open to the commercial exploitation of the peoples who are maintaining enormous armaments hostile to us, without even charging them a license fee for the opportunity of doing business in the best market in the world. Gentlemen on the other side harangue us in favor of a larger Navy and for formidable coast defense against a phantom yellow political peril, while they insist that we shall tear down our tariff wall, which protects us against a real and threatening yellow industrial peril. [Applause.]

AMERICAN STANDARDS AND WAGE SCALE.

I confess I have never been able to fathom the profound depths of the fallacy of the Democratic tariff position. We have here a standard of living and a wage scale far higher than that of any other people of the world, under which all of our people—with the exception of a small minority who insist on crowding the tenement districts of great cities and thereby subject themselves to the conditions inevitable in the intense labor competition of such localities—are better clothed, better fed, housed, educated, work fewer hours, enjoy more comforts, participate in more luxuries, are better cared for when destitute, injured, and afflicted, than any people who inhabit or have inhabited the face of the earth.

I find it hard to believe that gentlemen really expect that these conditions can be maintained under free competition with the products of the cheap labor of other lands, much of which is performed by men and women and little children, who live and die amid conditions of hopelessness and squalor we can scarcely realize; who never hope for, much less enjoy, the comforts and the blessings that are practically the universal heritage of the American people.

THE CASE OF ENGLAND.

But England, say the advocates of free trade and tariff for revenue only, has, next to us, the best-paid labor in the world. She has, because she has been the workshop of the world; because a wide-flung colonial empire, vast accumulations of capital, and generations of trained artisans enabled her to secure to a large extent the markets of the world for her manufactured products. She could not live unto herself; she must live as a manufacturing nation or perish utterly. And yet who desires to establish English conditions in the United States, with her army of paupers, her impoverished farming class, her constantly increasing struggle to maintain her commercial position among the nations of the world? We can not adopt her policy and do as well as she does, and if we did we would invite a condition which to the American workingman and the American farmer would be utterly intolerable.

All the balance of the world has proven the wisdom of the protective system—Germany, with her marvelous progress and development; France, with her people busy and, from their standards, prosperous; and the other nations of the world who have applied with wisdom the policy of protection to their industries.

To hear our Democratic friends talk one would imagine that the matter of government is the simplest thing in the world; that all that need be done in the matter of tariff is to place duties on a few articles without much regard to what they are, being careful that none of them protect any citizen in labor or enterprise, then go fishing, and everything would be lovely. I have heard of men who were said to be able to successfully set their mouths to going and go off and leave them, and I have sometimes wondered if experiences of that kind do not lead some gentlemen to think that the commercial and industrial enterprises of a great nation could be conducted on the same simple plan.

PROVISIONS OF THE BILL.

So much for the general proposition. Now, how about this bill? It is not necessary for anyone to analyze it. After the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] got through with it the other day it was as full of holes as a peekaboo shirt waist. [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MONDELL. My time is limited, and I prefer that the gentleman should wait until I conclude; but I will yield to him.

Mr. SIMS. Is it not a fact that every protective law is a law in restraint of trade?

Mr. MONDELL. No; a protective law is not necessarily a law in restraint of trade. Most protective laws we have had have vastly increased trade. When we were buying rails in England at $120 a ton and laying them on American railways there was mighty little business in steel rails anywhere, but after we put a protective tariff on them we increased the output of rails and vastly decreased the price. My friend from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON] calls my attention to the wonderful expansion of trade through the influence of a tariff on tin. Our history is full of illustrations of that kind.

The bill proposes to put agricultural implements on the free list, and that is supposed to be the master stroke to catch the farmer. The gentleman from Kentucky, after describing the glorious conquest of foreign markets by American products, including grain, said:

> Why does he ship it abroad? Because of the fact that he gets a better price for it abroad or as good a price abroad after deducting the freight.

If the American gets as good or a better price abroad, then how is the American farmer or any American citizen to be benefited by placing upon the free list articles of which we sell vast quantities abroad at as high or a higher price than they are sold here and which no one believes would be imported in any quantity, even though placed on the free list?

Mr. CARLIN. How is anybody hurt?

Mr. MONDELL. One of those hurt is the farmer.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. For a question

Mr. HARDY. Does the gentleman in good faith contend that agricultural implements manufactured in this country are shipped abroad and sold at a higher price there than they are here?

Mr. MONDELL. I do. That was proved by an official investigation. The gentleman from Illinois placed the evidence of it in the RECORD, and I propose to place the same evidence in the RECORD—an official record gathered by the Department of Commerce and Labor, through its agents—showing the cost of binders, reapers, mowers, and rakes in the United States and in Europe, and effectually exploding that old and time-honored Democratic error that these goods are sold cheaper abroad than here.

Mr. CARLIN. If the gentleman's statement be true, then there can certainly be no longer need for the protection of these industries.

Mr. MONDELL. I will answer the gentleman's question a little further along. If I do not, I will thank him to remind me of it.

Mr. HARDY. I would like to ask if the gentleman from Wyoming is willing to rest his case on the allegation that agricultural implements sell higher abroad than at home?

Mr. MONDELL. I am willing to accept the truth, wherever I find it.

Mr. CARLIN. Then you ought to take the tariff off these articles.

Mr. MONDELL. I am willing to take the word of the official agents of the United States Government.

Mr. CARLIN. Then you ought to take the tariff off.

Mr. MONDELL. The following table gives the price of certain farm implements at home and abroad:

Comparative statement of the retail prices of binders, mowers, reapers, and rakes in the United States and the principal European countries, as shown by the reports of the Bureau of Manufactures, United States Department of Commerce and Labor.

	Binders.	Reapers.	Mowers.	Rakes.
United States	$125.00	$75.00	$50.00	$22.00

BAGGING, BURLAP, ETC.

It is proposed to put cotton bagging, burlap, and so forth, on which a duty of over $6,750,000 was collected last year on the free list, for the benefit, we are to assume, of the cotton planter, as the report accompanying the bill informs us that this material is chiefly used for covering cotton. Whether the placing of this material on the free list will furnish any American consumer with the product cheaper is a question; that it will reduce the national revenues by a little less than $7,000,000 is quite certain. Judging from a letter I received from the Carolina Bagging Co., of Henderson, N. C., I should be inclined to think that it will also have the usual effect of Democratic tariff legislation of closing down American factories.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. COLLIER. I understand you to say that it would reduce the revenue on cotton bagging six millions and something?

Mr. MONDELL. The revenue last year was between six and seven millions.

Mr. COLLIER. Why, on a 12,000,000-bale crop at 5 cents a bale, it amounts to only $625,000.

Mr. MONDELL. I am giving the gentleman the figures as I obtained them from the report made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], in which he states that the revenues obtained last year in this class of imports—cotton bagging, sacks, burlaps, and so forth, 1910—was $6,877,000.

Mr. COLLIER. Oh, that includes sacks, and so forth. I was talking about cotton bagging. I wish to ask the gentleman this question. He seems to have gone very deeply into the subject——

Mr. MONDELL. Not at all. I have only touched the surface, though I hope that I have gone deeper into it than some of the gentlemen on the other side.

Mr. COLLIER. If it takes so much revenue from the Government to take the tax off cotton bagging, which is used by the southern farmer to wrap the product of his soil, why is it that there has been given to the western farmer binding twine, made out of the same vegetable that cotton bagging is made of, absolutely free, with which to wrap the products of his soil?

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, Mr. Chairman, I can not yield to a speech. The gentleman's question is hardly a question. It is rather an argument based on the same false premises on which they base all of the other arguments relative to the tariff, and that is that placing an article upon the free list or reducing the duty on an article necessarily makes it cheap, when as a matter of fact the reverse is often true. [Applause on Republican side.] If the gentleman would study the facts more and theorize less, he would understand how that occurs.

In a circular which I have here it is stated that there are seven bagging factories in North Carolina, three in South Carolina, three in Virginia, and three in Georgia, and our attention is called to the fact that in India, where jute, which is the principal product of which this material is made and manufactured, is grown, the manufacturers pay an average of 50 cents a week to their laborers. But of course the fact that American labor is to be brought into competition with Asiatic labor living and dying under conditions degraded, hopeless, and comfortless almost beyond belief will cause no pause in the program of the gentlemen on the other side. It is unfortunate that those people should live under the condition they do, but we must not reduce our people to their level. What we do will be in the direction of raising them to ours. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BARTLETT. May I interrupt the gentleman for a second——

Mr. MONDELL. Even the professions of loyalty to the policy of a tariff for revenue, which ought to apply in the face of the awful competition with the Asiatic labor on these lines, will not, I imagine, cause gentlemen to hesitate a moment to fix things so that the cotton planter will never vote anything but the Democratic ticket.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wyoming yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. MONDELL. I will be glad to do so.

Mr. BARTLETT. Can the gentleman state how much cotton bagging is manufactured in India? Does not the gentleman know it to be a fact—I will call it that, because I think it will be established—that the Cotton Bagging Trust not only sells what it manufactures, but purchases this cotton bagging, made in India by cheap labor, and sells it in this country to the cotton planter at an increased price by reason of the tariff?

Mr. MONDELL. I presume people who deal in cotton bagging have to buy from the people who make it——

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL (continuing). And we manufacture but a small proportion of the cotton bagging of the world now; and how much of it will we produce when cotton bagging is placed upon the free list? Now the Asiatic must pay a little something for our market; then the Asiatic will receive the benefits of our market free, and if there be a trust, such as the gentleman from Georgia states, the trust will gobble up the difference, and the cotton planter will never know what has happened to the benefits he was promised. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MONDELL. I can not yield further.

Mr. BARTLETT. But the gentleman is simply mistaken in his facts—that the majority of our cotton bagging is made abroad; it is not, not a third, not a fourth is made——

Mr. MONDELL. I think the gentleman is mistaken, but if he is not that is all the greater reason why we should not put bagging on the free list. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] so thoroughly dissected this bill it is absolutely cruel to refer further to its crudities, but we might for a moment call attention to the fact that while the gentlemen have put burlap and bagging on the free list, the duty on linoleum and on wall coverings and other goods made of burlap still remains, so that while reducing the tariff on one article they increase the tariff on a dozen others, and still the gentlemen claim and say that the Payne bill was too high. Why, they are raising the duty in the Payne bill by reducing the duty on the raw material and not changing it on the finished product.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, that I can not yield now, because I fear I will not have time enough to conclude. After I conclude——

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I simply want to call the gentleman's attention——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. MONDELL. I yield for a moment.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I understood the gentleman to say that he would yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman finally yielded.

Mr. MONDELL. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I understood the gentleman to say a moment ago, referring to a speech of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], that he, Mr. JAMES, said that manufactured articles were sold abroad for a higher price than they are here.

Mr. MONDELL. I have not read the gentleman's speech. I am quoting from memory. Possibly the gentleman only intended to apply his remarks to agricultural products.

COTTON TIES, BARBED WIRE, ETC.

It is proposed to put cotton ties, baling wire, and barbed wire on the free list, with the expectation that the American farmer will imagine he is going to be vastly benefited thereby. If all the duties remitted under these items were to go into the pockets of the farmers of the country, it might furnish them with enough for one 5-cent cigar per annum.

LEATHER AND BOOTS AND SHOES.

Next to the agricultural-implement item, the one that is confidently expected will most appeal to the farmer is that which places heavy leather, boots and shoes, harness and saddlery on the free list. We imported these articles in the year 1910 to the amount of $1,319,622, while we exported like articles of the value of $37,178,938.

That being the case how is anyone going to be benefited by placing on the free list articles of which we only import one and one-third million dollars per annum while we export at a higher price or as good a price to the amount of nearly $140,000,000? In the eloquent words of the gentleman from Alabama, "We shoe the world," and he might have added "saddle the universe." What benefit, then, to any American citizen by placing the articles on the free list? What is there to it but a little cheap buncombe?

LUMBER.

A few days ago the House passed the Canadian reciprocity bill, and in defense you on the other side claimed that it was a most excellent trade, a fine bargain that we were driving with Canada. You said, among other things, we were to get the inestimable benefits of free lumber, the granting of which you assured us gave us valuable concessions in the Canadian market. And yet, before that pact becomes a law, you offer a bill which proposes to give all the world, without any consideration whatever, a wider free market than the Canadians were given in the reciprocity agreement. I was not expecting overmuch in the way of consistency from our friends on the other side, but I did expect that they would, at least for a few days, keep faith with Canada touching the matters treated of in the so-called reciprocity agreement.

SEWING MACHINES.

Last year we imported $76,000 worth of sewing machines and exported sewing machines of the value of $7,500,000. In other words, we exported one hundred times as many as we imported. We sent them to the ends of the earth, and in the manufacture, sale, and price of these machines we have no rivals worthy of the name. And yet our Democratic friends expect some people to believe that they are going to get sewing machines cheaper because they are placed on the free list.

SALT.

The American farmer is expected to be duly thankful to the Democratic Party for the proposition contained in this bill to put salt on the free list. Of course everyone knows that there is probably not a farmer in all the land who will ever purchase salt any cheaper on account of the removal of the duty. Salt is one of those articles which we produce cheaper and better than any people on earth, and the only place in all of our territory where salt can be imported with or without the duty is at some port where an occasional cargo might come in as ballast or some very limited region along our borders. And yet the American farmer and the American workingman will hear it from the hustings all over the land that the cost of living has been wonderfully reduced by the reduction of the duty on salt. Of course the farmer will not get his salt any cheaper, but the game may work through one campaign, particularly among the class of people, if there be any such, described in poetry by the gentleman from Kentucky.

MEATS ON FREE LIST.

This is the farmers' free list, so our friends on the other side say. It might very properly be described as an attempt to farm the farmer. It has been referred to in the minority report on the bill as "political soothing sirup." This is a most apt designation for most of its provisions. But soothing sirup is lulling in its effects, and there are some provisions in this bill that in the long run will, in my opinion, act on the farmer more after the manner of an emetic.

It is proposed to put fresh and cured meats on the free list, and this in the name and under the claim of benefit to the farmer. Ah! here is where our friends on the other side get in their fervid denunciation of the Beef Trust, and with fine frenzy declare that this will strike a fatal blow, in behalf of the people, at this infamous octopus.

There is a legend that centuries ago in China pigs were kept only as pets, and a Chinaman, who was very poor, kept one lone porker in the corner of his one-roomed cabin. One day, to his consternation, his home caught fire and was entirely consumed and the pet pig burned to death. In raking over the embers of his domicile the nostrils of the man with the cue were assailed by the savory odor of roast pig. So appealing was it that he immediately fell to, and all his neighbors with him, and devoured the toothsome porker, which had been done to a turn in the embers of the cabin. Thereupon and thereafter in all the region round about there ensued a perfect epidemic of house burning, with the accompaniment of roast-pig eating, and it is said that centuries passed, in which unnumbered dwellings were consumed, before it was discovered among the Chinese that a pig could be roasted without burning down a house. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman 30 minutes more. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. MONDELL. Now, I presume there may be a Meat Trust—at least a gentleman's agreement in the packing business—and I am inclined to believe the great firms engaged in that business do squeeze both the producer of live stock and the consumer of meat, and nothing should be left undone to prevent the packers from manipulating the market. But I do not think the farmer has ever called upon the Democratic Party to burn down his house to secure him the benefit of better treatment at the hands of the Beef Trust.

We are not the cheapest producers of meats in the world by any manner of means. The Argentine, with its limitless grazing lands under the control of a comparatively few men, with its semipeon labor, can and does undersell us in certain classes of meats in the markets of the world. New Zealand and, to a certain extent Australia, with cheaper labor and free grass lands, can and do sell meats of certain classes in the markets of the world cheaper than we can, particularly grass-fed fresh beef and mutton. And does the Democratic Party imagine that it can persuade the American farmer that they are benefiting him by throwing open our markets to the finished product of that which he produces?

OUR COMPETITORS.

Last year we exported fresh beef valued at a little over $7,000,000, Argentina over $12,000,000, and New Zealand's exports were valued at over $18,000,000. Last year Argentina exported 77,000 head of sheep and over 165,000,000 pounds of frozen mutton, while we exported less than 2,000,000 pounds of mutton, all of which illustrates the capacity of the countries mentioned to grow meats cheaply.

THE STOCKMAN, NOT THE PACKER, INJURED.

Assuming that the packers do not always pay a fair price for cattle and sheep, and I do not believe they do, the price they do pay, be it great or small, bears a certain fixed relation to and is regulated by the price which they obtain for their products and the extent of the market which they can find for them. If the packer controls the market, what difficulty will he have in reducing the price he pays for live stock in the amount he may be compelled to reduce the price for which he sells the finished product? Even though he may not be required to reduce his price in order to meet competition of foreign meats—he may simply divide some of his seacoast markets with them—the very fact that meats are brought into our country without duty gives an additional argument and leverage for beating down the price of live stock. And yet this extraordinary proposition is advanced in the name of the farmers of the country. Ah, gentlemen, remember the live-stock slump from 1894 to 1897, and remember what followed it—the transfer of the majority from that side to this.

WHY NOT FREE TRADE?

Now, I am reaching the question raised by the gentleman from Virginia a short time ago. Gentlemen on the other side say that so far as the items in this bill, such as agricultural implements, leather, boots and shoes, sewing machines, and barbed wire, which we now manufacture and sell in competition with all the world, are concerned, why not place them on the free list? It by no means follows that because we can, as to the major portion of the country and as to most of the items on a certain schedule, meet the competition of all the world, we should surrender without any consideration whatever the greatest market in all the world to the alien and the stranger.

NO RECIPROCAL ADVANTAGE.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] says that if we will only abandon our protective policy we can capture the markets of the world in every land where free competition can be obtained. We have already captured many of them and his promise of further conquest is perfectly safe as he has qualified it. No attempt is made in the bill to establish that condition of free competition on which he predicates his promise of further markets. This bill simply surrenders our market, leaving us confronted by high and in some cases with discriminating tariffs when we seek the markets of any country in the world except England for the same classes of goods it is proposed to place on the free list. In agricultural implements we now give a free market to every country which treats us likewise, but France, Germany, and the balance of Europe confront us with high duties on these goods. Even Canada still retains a duty of about 20 per cent against us in the reciprocity arrangement.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Moss] talked yesterday of the virtues of reciprocity and of the importance of seeking wider markets for American meats abroad. One would have imagined, to listen to him, that this was a reciprocity measure, that we were not surrendering our markets without receiving anything in return, but that we were actually proposing to obtain some reciprocal benefits. Ah, gentlemen, if we were, it would be a very different story. For myself I do not believe much in a free list anyway. If I were framing a tariff, I should put mighty few articles on the free list, though on articles of necessity or common use I would make the duties very low, and I would then use those duties as a basis for securing preferential treatment with our foreign competitors.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], in his speech the other day, grew facetious, almost funny, as he described certain articles which he said were on the free list in the Payne bill. Well, I felt somewhat crushed under that criticism, because I realize that my party is a proper subject of criticism and of ridicule whenever it follows a Democratic precedent. The articles over which he had so much joy were on the free list in the Wilson bill, and we adopted them. Of course, there was more reason for putting a variety of weird articles on the free list in the Wilson bill than there was in putting like articles on our tariff bill, but there were some things put on the free list in the Wilson bill the placing of which on that list was an entirely unnecessary act. For instance, they put asafœtida on the free list. Did not the Wilson bill smell loud enough without any asafœtida? [Laughter on the Republican side.] They also, if I recollect rightly, put nux vomica on the free list. Why, the American people did not need any imported emetic. The bill furnished a sufficient amount of that without having emetics free.

There were other articles that they placed on the free list very appropriately. They placed rags on the free list. Rags were entirely proper on a Democratic free list, because they were the fashionable clothing at the time that bill was in operation. [Laughter on the Republican side.] They also put spunk on the free list, and that was fortunate, for the American people surely did need all the spunk they could get during those days to hold their heads above water. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

I do not know why they put teeth on the free list, for they did not furnish us with anything in particular to eat, but perhaps it was due to the fact that they knew the times were going to be mighty tough and the chewing would be hard. [Applause on the Republican side.] And they were.

There are certain classes of articles which we do not produce, such as tea and coffee. There are many other articles which by reason of our natural resources, the marvelous efficiency of our people, the wonderful development of our industries, we can produce as cheap or more cheaply than any people on earth. As to all these which are articles of necessity and of common use, I should under no circumstances make the duty burdensome, but I should at least make the foreigner pay something, be it ever so little, for the privilege of our markets.

THE HAND THAT PROTECTS.

Every hand that produces and fashions these articles at home is a hand of defense and support to the Republic and makes its contribution to the Government and society. Every hand that produces and fashions an article abroad is a neutral and may become a hostile hand, and contributes naught to either the support of Government or of institutions. It is the experience of the world that at least in the case of low tariffs the foreigner in the main pays the tax. Having placed most articles on the dutiable list, though many of them at a low rate, I should then use that list and those articles as the basis of reciprocity agreements.

Even though it were true that in a general revision of the tariff, with all the schedules before us, with the opportunity of weighing, comparing, adjusting, and dovetailing one with another, it might be held that some of the articles in the bill before us could be placed on the free list without harm to American industries and with possible slight advantage to the American people, would we be justified in doing it without an attempt to secure reciprocal advantages?

OPPORTUNITY FOR RECIPROCITY.

Here are many articles, occupying a large place in the commerce of the Nation, taken from the dutiable list and placed on the free list with all of the recklessness and disregard of the sources of income or of the ultimate effect with which a drunken sailor squanders his wages. Is there nothing in this list of articles for which France, Germany, Austria, Italy—now barring the extension of our trade by high tariffs and burdensome regulations—will grant preferential treatment to some of our products? If the Democratic Party wants to do something for the American people, instead of ruthlessly tearing down tariff walls, opening the gates to the flood of foreign importations, without recompense or return, why not do something for the American farmer and stockman by securing him a wider market in France or Germany, or both, for American meats and farm products?

Of course, the gentlemen on the other side will say they are not in position to enter into negotiations of that sort, therefore they place the articles on the free list without receiving any reciprocal advantages. Why place them on the free list at all? The reasons given will neither satisfy nor convince the American people.

ATTITUDE OF A PROTECTIONIST.

There are, I understand, some Republicans who, now that the Canadian reciprocity bill, which largely deprives the farmer and stockman of some of the benefits of protection, has passed the House, are inclined to vote for this bill or some of its schedules. I am unable to follow the reasoning which justifies such action on the part of a protectionist. Few on either side of the Chamber, in my opinion, believe all the provisions of the bill are good. Certainly no one on this side does, and yet the Democratic majority are bound by caucus action to take it as it stands, and therefore it can not be amended. The caucus binds, though the bill does not reflect the views of many Members on that side. How can any believer in protection under such circumstances vote for a bill treating of a few schedules brought in by the enemies of protection and proclaimed the first step, not of lower protection duties, but for abolition of all protection duties?

In some parts of the world they play a game with cards, I am told—coming from a proper community myself, I know nothing of it except from hearsay [laughter]—in which all the cards save one, the hole card, are dealt face up. This looks to me like such a game, in which the Democratic dealer, having seen the other fellow's hand, calls on him to play, while he, the dealer, still has his hole card face down. Does anybody on this side know what that hidden card is? Is it free wool, free Mexican cattle, a revenue duty only on all industries, and we to have no hand in the determination of them? That is the best guess we can make, and is any Republican ready to buy into a brace game of that sort?

WHAT IS THE FUTURE POLICY TO BE?

If any argument were needed to show the utter fallacy, the absurdity, the viciousness, of a schedule-by-schedule revision, this bill furnishes it. What if the bill should pass? What other popgun bills are to follow? No one knows whether they will iron out the bumps this bill creates; no one knows what the revision will be like in its entirety, if ever completed; no one knows whether the proposed revision will proceed along the free-trade lines of this bill or will in spots reflect the tariff-for-revenue views of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], or in spots the "tear-the-customhouses-down-from-turret-to-foundation-stone" views of our honored Speaker, or in other spots the "save-my-industries-and-swat-all-others" tariff views of some of our friends on both sides of the Chamber. Nobody knows.

There is and can be but one sane, sound, and sensible way to legislate on the tariff, and that is to adopt a policy in regard to it and bring every schedule into harmony with that policy and into harmony with every other schedule. Under that plan a tariff is a mosaic; under the procedure now invoked it is a grab bag. The southern Members have grabbed cotton ties and bagging. I suppose they are expected to hold the bag the next time while some of their colleagues grab something for their districts. They talk about logrolling in tariff revision. Logrolling is a necessary preliminary to house building. This procedure is purse snatching. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

TARIFF-FOR-REVENUE ADVOCATES.

Where are the gentlemen on the other side of the aisle who have been clamoring for tariff for revenue? If the articles now proposed to be placed on the free list are not proper and legitimate subjects for revenue tariff, what articles are? If we are to throw away 10 millions of revenue in this measure, 5 millions of revenue in another measure, 20 millions of revenue next week on the wool schedule, Uncle Sam will soon be going around, hat in hand, taking up a collection to run the Government.

BELIEVER IN A PROTECTIVE TARIFF.

Mr. Chairman, I am a believer in the protective-tariff system. I do not believe you can maintain here a wage scale and a standard of living far above that of the balance of the world and at the same time open the floodgates to the importation of the products of the underpaid labor such as is found, unfortunately, in many regions of the earth. The protective-tariff system needs no defense. No argument ought to be required in support of it in this country. The greatest story of temporal things that the world has ever heard or witnessed in its unfolding is the story of the growth, progress, advancement, and prosperity of the American people under the protective system. [Applause on the Republican side.] The bill before us is the product of the enemies of that system, announced as an attempt to break it down. It requires centuries for wise men to create, plan, rear, and adorn the magnificent works of art in architecture which a yokel and a vandal, given an opportunity and a little dynamite, can destroy in the twinkling of an eye. It has taken generations to lay the foundations, build, and develop the mighty industries of this great Nation.

In this great work we have had the benefit of the marvelous skill and energy of some of the greatest captains of industry and of the most efficient army of artisans the world has ever known. To frame and execute the laws which have wisely encouraged this development has been the life work of a long line of patriots and statesmen.

There was Abraham Lincoln, who said:

I do not know much about the tariff, but I know that if you buy a ton of steel rails abroad you have the rails and the foreigner has the money; if you make a ton of rails here, you have both the rails and the money.

There was Grant, great captain, returning from the fields of war to encourage the arts of peace; Blaine, teacher of true reciprocity; Reed, stalwart champion of American industries; Dingley, master of tariff schedules; and McKinley, high priest of protection. Their names and the names of those who labored with them glorify and illuminate the pages of American history. The story of their lives comprises all that is best in the history of the past two generations. What about those who preached and, when they had the opportunity, practiced the doctrines now proclaimed by the gentlemen on the other side? They are forgotten except as they are remembered as misguided teachers of false economic doctrines and perhaps for virtues that in part offset their errors and follies touching these things. Which policy, then, shall we pursue—the policy which has brought prosperity or the policy which has led to disaster? Which leaders shall we follow—those who have immortalized themselves or those who have been discredited? As for me, I shall follow the banner of protection to American labor and American industries, and I shall vote against the bill not only because it is hastily and crudely drawn and scantily considered, though it is all that; not only because its proposals are either vain, visionary, or vicious; but more because, being all these, it is a blow at the policy of protection and therefore a menace to the well-being and happiness of our people. [Prolonged applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER].

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, if I can get the attention of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], I want to call his attention to one or two matters for the sake of accuracy. A familiar quotation from Lord Byron, slightly paraphrased, would run thus: "Now, I like Republicans, because they can't or won't do otherwise than misstate facts; but they do it so well the truth seems falsehood to it." [Applause on the Democratic side.] If I understood the gentleman correctly a few minutes ago, he said that the Democratic charge, frequently made, that American manufacturers ship their products to foreign countries and sell them there at lower prices than American consumers are required to pay for the same kind of goods has been exploded, and that he would put in the RECORD official figures and statistics showing it, and that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], in a recent speech, gave "the whole snap away" when he said:

Why do they ship goods abroad? Because they get better prices, or as good a price, abroad for them as they do at home.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Yes; for a question.

Mr. MONDELL. I quoted the gentleman from Kentucky accurately, and the gentleman should quote me accurately. I recall the gentleman's words very clearly. I have not read the speech, because I made a memorandum of it, and his words were these—after referring to the enormous export of leather and boots and shoes, he said:

Why are these goods exported in these quantities? Because they are sold for a higher or as high a price as they bring here.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. The gentleman is accurate in his statement, but only in a technical way. It is true, Mr. Chairman, that Mr. JAMES used language similar to that the gentleman quotes, but it was after he had ceased talking about manufactured products—boots and shoes and other leather goods—and it was while he was talking about wheat and not about boots and shoes, as the gentleman must know, and will know if he will read the speech referred to. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman will yield for a moment.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Just a moment.

Mr. MONDELL. My recollection still is, and I was listening with a great deal of attention, that the gentleman from Kentucky was discussing the exports of leather when he made the statement; and I am inclined to think you will find it there in his speech.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I have the speech here. Let me read to the gentleman and to the House what Mr. JAMES said. Mr. JAMES, in the speech quoted by the gentleman—and he has the speech before him—said:

The boot and shoe makers of this country sent abroad boots and shoes to the extent of $13,216,000, or an increase of $3,500,000 in the sale of boots and shoes as compared with last year. Why can they not sell them to the American consumer as cheaply as they can ship them across the ocean and sell them in competition with the world?

That is what he said. Then, again, he said:

Now, the question I want answered, and you must answer it to justify your system that you are pursuing here, is this: If these men can ship this amount of goods, and they gladly do it, into foreign countries and sell $51,000,000 in competition with the world, why can they not sell here to the American consumer without any protective tariff at all?

Further—and I will ask the gentleman's attention, because I think he will correct his speech when he puts it in the RECORD—Mr. JAMES said:

It will not do to undertake to answer this argument by saying that they are sold as cheaply here as abroad. That statement is untrue; that you have fought and are now fighting for a protective tariff shows it to be untrue.

That is what the gentleman from Kentucky said, but it is not what the gentleman from Wyoming says he said.

Continuing, Mr. JAMES said:

If they were sold as cheaply here as they are abroad, why would you ask for a protective tariff?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I would like about two minutes more.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield that much time to the gentleman.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. When discussing the exportation of one of our great staple crops, the surplus of American wheat, Mr. JAMES said:

When the American farmer is forced to send abroad 100,000,000 bushels of wheat or corn, he does it because he can not sell it here, and he can not sell it here because our people can not consume it.

He argued that the surplus of wheat and corn shipped abroad commands as good a price, or a better price, than here, because we can not consume it here, but he expressly said that manufactured articles protected by a tariff wall are sold in foreign countries, and, I assert, in every market of the world, at a less price than American citizens are required to pay for them.

Again, Mr. JAMES said:

I know the Republican Party has tried to fool the farmer for years upon this question of a protective tariff upon his wheat and corn.

Now, to be fair to the gentleman from Kentucky, who is not here, I will say that I am not his champion. He needs none. He can stand alone and meet every Republican orator on that side and sustain himself before the great body of the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.] But in the interest of fairness I make these remarks, and I challenge the gentleman now to correct his speech before he puts it in the RECORD, and let it conform to the facts. And if he finds it a hard road to travel, if he finds this tariff wall, this protective tariff which robs the people he represents, the producer and the wage earner as well—and if I had time, I could show that it does—he should repent and go down into the waters and be baptized into the living faith of Democracy, and then he would not have to appeal to error to sustain his position. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES].

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Among the tenderfoot Congressmen whose names have been added to the directory at this session I presume I am the youngest and the tenderest.

Tenderfoot that I am naturally, I have been touched and by nothing have I been so deeply touched and at the same time edified as by the solicitude, the love, and esteem evidenced by the gentlemen on the Republican side of this House, especially those hailing from the New England cities, for my good friends the farmers. With tears in their voices as well as their eyes, they have pleaded for the farmers during the consideration of the reciprocity bill, and I hoped and almost believed that the farmer was at last coming into his own. A little skeptical I was as to the protestations that the farmer would be hurt by that bill, but satisfied entirely was I that even though it should prove injurious to the farmers of the Northwest, justice would be meted unto them by these Republican Representatives when they had an opportunity to vote for the farmers' free-list bill, and firmly did I believe that their wonderful intellects would be exerted and musical voices raised in behalf of that bill. But now I find it was all a mistake. Mr. DALZELL, who does not live within 150 miles of a farm, but earnestly pleads that the farmers be not hurt by the passage of the reciprocity bill, now reports that this farmers' free-list bill is but soothing sirup offered to the farmers. If he is correct, and we must presume he is, then how can he, after protesting last week that "my brotherly love is for my own kin, for the American farmer, not for his Canadian competitor," now refuse to give even soothing sirup to the object of his affections. [Applause.]

And then the minority leader [Mr. MANN], after having pleaded for the farmers during the consideration of the reciprocity bill, now opposes the passage of this bill, criticizing its form more than anything else. After listening to him I agreed with the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON], that if the Democratic Party proposed for adoption the Ten Commandments, he would so criticize them as to cause even Mr. HEFLIN to fear that it would be unwise to adopt them. His strained construction of the provisions of this bill is equaled only by the construction Finnegan placed upon the tax laws when, soon after his election as auditor, he sent his friend Dooley a notice that there was due the county $8 taxes on his goat. Dooley forthwith presented himself, his Irish up, and said, "Finnegan, what does it mean? I've owned that durn goat for three years and never paid tax on it, and sure I'm satisfied there's no law for it." "Indade, there is," says Finnegan. "I've read the tax laws, and it provides that all property abutting and abounding on the public highway shall be taxed at the rate of $2 per foot, and, sure, yez can't deny that your goat has four feet." [Applause and laughter.] In much the same manner does Mr. MANN construe the provisions of this bill, alleging that it is vague and uncertain, because it fails to define what an agricultural implement is. It is sufficiently definite, however, to admit free of taxation those implements used by agriculturists in the tillage of the soil, and that is its purpose. [Applause.]

The discussion of this and the preceding bill has covered a wide range, and several gentlemen on the other side who do not apparently approve of the efforts to deceive the farmer resort to an effort to arouse prejudice against these bills by styling them sectional legislation or intimating that such is the fact. When the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] was addressing this House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT] asked him to tell him something of the class of labor employed in the cotton mills of the South, and give some information as to educational statistics among the operatives of the cotton mills, and also state whether child labor is employed. Had the gentleman been acquainted with conditions and with the laws he would have known that wise and humane legislation prohibits the employment of child labor and limits the hours of labor of all operatives to 10 hours a day. In comparison with the salary and mileage of the gentleman from Pennsylvania the operatives are poorly paid, but for the class of work demanded of them their wages are fair. Their complaint, and a just one it is, is that while wages have not been increased the cost of living under Republican misrule has increased. [Applause.]

As a class they are of the highest order, pure-blooded Americans, most of them living in the counties and States wherein their great grandfathers were born—intelligent, patriotic, loyal citizens—poor, possibly, but proud, and not seeking sympathy from any man or set of men. They have come to the mills from the farms, as a rule, and this fact would indicate that the boasted prosperity of the farmers which Mr. CANNON attributes to the policies of the Republican Party is not as general as it might be. In that most entertaining speech delivered by Mr. CANNON he pictured the wonderful improvement of conditions in North Carolina, attributing it, of course, to Republican legislation, but in the next breath he stated that the farmer now living on his old place in North Carolina told him that the old gullies had been removed by throwing up dams, and that he had learned the use of clover and cowpeas, thus disproving the statement of Mr. CANNON that the farmer's prosperity is due to legislation, Republican or Democratic, and proving conclusively that it is due to his own unaided exertions, his adoption of new methods of farming, applying intelligence to his labors, the only way in which the farmer has ever prospered or will ever prosper.

Out of the wave of general prosperity extending over the country the farmer has now and again received a small touch of it, but it has never been due to legislation here. Not long since a citizen of Ohio summarized the situation in this manner:

Nearly $1,000,000 a day is being spent by the Government for war purposes in the Army, in the Navy, and for pensions, or 67½ per cent of all Government expenses are incurred for war purposes, yet in time of war, as has ever been the case, the volunteer soldier from the farm has to be the Nation's reliance for national defense and aggressiveness. For education, 3 per cent represents the expenditure, and for agriculture 1½ per cent; for feed, $1; for fight, $37; for brains, $1; for bullets, $22; to encourage production, $1; to encourage idleness, $37; to shoot brains in, $1; to shoot brains out, $22; for culture, refinement, and education, $1; for shotgun business in time of peace, $22; Army increasing, food supply decreasing.

[Applause.]

Because of the item in this bill removing the duty on cotton bagging and ties, Republican Members of this House charge that the entire bill is sectional legislation. While the bill removes duties upon articles consumed and used by people of the entire country, this is the only item offering relief to the cotton growers alone, and in all fairness I ask if it be not time that the interests of the cotton grower be given a little consideration? Half a century has passed since the echo of the last cannon died in silence. Half a century has elapsed since the soldiers of the Northern and of the Southern armies returned to their homes, the one flushed and elated with victory and with hope; the other almost in despair, having suffered endless privation and having lost all but the proud consciousness that they had shown their readiness and willingness to suffer and die in a cause they honestly believed to be right and just. Returning to their homes they found that after the cessation of hostilities agents of this Government were seizing cotton lawfully the property of the people of the South, at a time when they were in poverty and distress. According to the records on file in the Treasury Department, 33,638 bales of cotton were seized and sold, and after deducting alleged expenses of $2,160,434.86, there was turned into the Treasury of the United States the sum of $4,886,671, the proceeds of the cotton belonging to the cotton growers of the South. By acts of Congress of 1862, 1864, 1866, and 1867, a direct tax was levied upon raw cotton, a tax now commonly known as the illegal cotton tax, because by all lawyers it is conceded, and by the Supreme Court has it been decided, to be unconstitutional. According to the records in the office of Commissioner of Internal Revenue, there was collected by the levying of this tax from the farmers of the South $68,072,388.90, more than $4,000,000 being collected from the cotton growers of the State of South Carolina alone. Notwithstanding that this tax has in effect been decided by the Supreme Court to have been unconstitutional, the Government has had the use of this $68,000,000, the money of the cotton growers of the South, for 50 years, and this Congress has never given even serious consideration to the just pleas of the victims of this unconstitutional legislation for reimbursement. Unfair and unjust as has been the policy of the Government in these two matters, the people of the South, and especially the cotton growers of the South, have never wavered in their loyalty and devotion to this great Government of ours.

When the call to arms was sounded in 1898 these same cotton growers were among the first to volunteer to risk their lives in the cause of our country, and to-day I plead for the blotting out of sectional lines in legislation, for the harmonizing of all sections of this country, for the cementing together by the ties of common interest, brotherly love and affection all the people of this great country of ours, and earnestly plead that this or any other legislation be considered upon its merits and without regard to the section of the country it may perchance offer relief to.

This bill is in thorough accord with Democratic principles because it equalizes the benefits distributed under its provisions. The protected industries of the country have apparently believed that the people can not be robbed unless deceived, and that to deceive them they must be persuaded that they are robbed for their own advantage, and through the Republican policy of protection they have to a great extent accomplished their ends by convincing the people that in order to protect some one industry in a district benefiting a few people, they must consent to the rest of the inhabitants of the district being robbed by thousands of protected industries located in other sections. The Democratic Party, on the other hand, stands for a tariff for revenue only, this policy being determined in the councils of the party and declared in its platforms. It stands for a tariff for revenue as against the policy of the Republican Party of a tariff for protection with incidental revenue. The Democratic Party not believing in absolute free trade it is not to be expected that the committee intrusted with the consideration of a tariff legislation should propose for passage here a bill placing on the free list all the articles that the ardent free trader believes should be included. As you can not make an omelet without an egg, so you can not run this Government without money. The removal of duties from the articles specified in this bill will, according to the statement of Mr. UNDERWOOD, reduce the revenue $10,000,000, and until we have an income tax or some other source from which we can secure revenue it would be the sheerest folly to extend this free list and reduce the revenue to any greater extent. It is true that it is proposed after the passage of this bill to reduce the prohibitive duties now levied on one or two articles in most general use by the people, but a reduction on such articles instead of further reducing the revenue will increase it by the increased importations it will make possible.

The provision for the removal of the duty upon cotton bagging and ties, which is the object of special attack, I ask to consider first for a few moments. The cotton crop of the South is a great crop, averaging 12,000,000 bales a year, approximately five-eighths of which is exported and exchanged for foreign gold, amounting to $500,000,000. By the operation of the present tariff duty on the cotton ties necessary in marketing the crop, the farmer is made to pay a tax of 0.027 cent a bale, which on the total crop amounts to $324,000 a year. On his cotton bagging he is by the operation of the tariff forced to pay a tax of 5¼ cents a bale, amounting on the entire crop to $630,000, making a total of $954,000 annually paid by the cotton growers to the Bagging and Tie Trust for the enrichment of their stockholders. In South Carolina last year 1,210,968 bales of cotton were produced, and in marketing this crop the farmers paid through the duty on bagging and ties $63,575.82, and in my own district the tax paid by the farmers to these manufacturers through the operation of this duty amounted to $13,374.80, or almost $2 to every farmer. Now, under these circumstances, having been the victim of direct taxation immediately after the war, and the victim of this indirect taxation on his bagging and ties for years, is it not fair and just that if a free list is to be introduced here that the cotton grower should be the beneficiary of some legislation?

Daily do we receive letters and petitions from the manufacturers of bagging and ties, to whose success the farmers have been contributing for years, beseeching us not to vote to remove this tax from the farmers. The farmers, on the other hand, are not so organized as to present their complaints and petitions to this body, but in the performance of our duties no better guide could be asked for than that offered by Speaker CLARK on the opening day of this session when the said:

> No man is fit to be a lawgiver for a mighty people who yields to the demands and solicitations of the few having access to his ear but is forgetful of that vast multitude who may never hear his voice or look into his face.

[Applause.]

The farmer receives and asks for no protection upon his products. He sells in an unprotected market and buys in a protected market, and it is not fair that he should be made eternally to take money out of his pockets and transfer it to the pockets of the manufacturers as a contribution to their continued prosperity. The wheat farmer of the Northern and Northwestern States pays no tax on his binding twine. Then why should the cotton grower be made to pay it on his bagging and ties? Understand me, I do not mean that a duty should be levied on binding twine. On the contrary, I think it in accord with Democratic principles in equalizing the benefits as well as the taxation that there should be no duty on it, and I think I am safe in saying that if an effort were made to place a tax upon the binding twine of the wheat farmer of the North and Northwest that the Representatives of the cotton-growing States in the Democratic Party would be found opposing such effort. We want them to have their binding twine on the free list and ask only for the same privilege for the cotton grower of the South.

So much for that provision in the bill. It does benefit the cotton grower by the removal of the duty on bagging and ties and on hides. It benefits the farmers of the entire Nation by the removal of the duties on agricultural implements. It benefits the wage earner of the great cities of New England as well as the rest of the country by the removal of the duty on meat, cereals, flour, and breadstuffs of all kinds. It benefits the people generally, and especially those along the Canadian border by the removal of the duty on lumber, in accordance with the pledge of the Democratic platform. It benefits the wage earner by the removal of the duty on leather, boots, and shoes, and it benefits the people of the entire country by the removal of the duty on salt, sewing machines, and other articles. It is legislation in the interest of the people generally, and especially the agriculturalists. Helping the farmers, as it does, at this day it may be considered tardy justice, but it is justice, nevertheless, and it is better late than never. Its passage will be in accord with the character of legislation already passed by this House at this session under the able leadership of Chairman UNDERWOOD. The bill providing for the direct election of United States Senators, in view of the widespread demand for such legislation, is certain to meet with the approval of the people.

The passage of the bill providing for the publication of campaign funds before as well as after the election is but carrying out the preelection promises of the Democratic Party. The passage of the reciprocity bill—a Democratic measure, though proposed by a Republican President—was made possible only by Democratic votes in this House, and for its passage our party must and will receive the credit, distasteful though it be to the President. As a result of its passage there will be an awakening of the northern farmer to a realization of the fact that the protection he has been given by the Republican Party for years has, after all, been only an imaginary benefit; and, once awakened, he will realize that by the passage of the pending bill, proposed by the Democratic Party, he is offered substantial relief, and no longer will he be found joined to his idols. At the very organization of this House the Democratic Party showed its sincerity in redeeming its campaign pledges. Believing that retrenchment should begin at home, this majority, in pursuance of our promise to economize in the expenditures of the Government, abolished useless offices, sinecures established for the perpetuation of the Republican Party, thus saving to the Government in this matter alone $180,000 a year. This but gives an indication of the manner in which the investigations of the various departments will be conducted, with a view to cutting down the enormous expenditures now incurred, and, though not a prophet or the son of a prophet, I venture to predict that the conduct of the Democratic Party in this House will so justify the confidence of the people that when the battle of ballots is fought in November, 1912, that their majority in this House will be retained, the Republicans will be ousted from their control of the Senate, driven from the executive offices, Democracy be enthroned, and the people rule once more. [Loud applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. FOCHT. Will the gentleman from Alabama yield the gentleman from South Carolina time enough for me to ask him a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am sorry, but we want to get on in this debate. Mr. Chairman, I will yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] 45 minutes.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I hope my friends will not all go to dinner now, although the provocation is quite sufficient. [Laughter.] Our friends over on that side have been repudiated by their own people, the protectionists, and I am here to make a talk, not so much a speech or oration, but a simple talk. I will touch on a few subjects that I think will be of interest within themselves even if not so well presented.

It looks like, in this day, after we have had 50 years of uninterrupted protection, that all speeches and discussions have been along the line of protection as a policy so long that the country has forgotten fundamentals.

Now, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, in this discussion I am not representing the Democratic Party. I am not authorized to speak for it. I am not undertaking to bind anybody to follow my views; but I will give my reasons why I hold the views I do, and if the reasons do not appeal to you, you need not accept my views. I am not trying to bind the Democratic Party. It is composed of people who think independently.

According to my own belief, and according to what I think is fundamental, every man has, or he ought to have, the unrestricted right as an individual to purchase the necessaries of life where he can get the largest amount of the same for the least amount of money or other thing of value. Is not that axiomatic? Should not the individual citizen have the unrestrained right to purchase where he can get the greatest amount of the thing purchased for the least amount of money or other thing of value? Is there anything wrong in that abstractly considered? Let us see the other side of it. A man, as an individual, has, or ought to have, the unrestrained right of selling what he produces as the result of his labor or capital, or both, where he can get the highest price for the same. Is there anything wrong about that? Is that not axiomatic? Is that not fundamentally correct? Any law, regulation, or custom, which interferes with the full and free exercise of these two fundamental laws of trade and commerce can be tolerated only upon the supposition that some indirect or unnatural benefit is to be derived therefrom of such general character as to warrant depriving the individual of some of his rights or benefits in behalf of the public or for the general welfare.

Taxation, per se, can not possibly confer a direct or personal benefit upon the individual subject to taxation. Taxation must be justified by the indirect or impersonal benefits conferred on organized society as a whole. Taxes should never be levied upon or collected from the whole people except for purposes of benefiting, either directly or indirectly, the whole people.

Is there any objection to these statements I am making? When a tax is levied for the benefit, direct or indirect, of a limited number or class of citizens, those only who are to receive such benefits directly or incidentally should be compelled to pay such tax. Is there anything wrong about that?

When you levy a tax to build a street in your city, do you not charge up the special or local benefits to the abutting property owners? Is it not right? Is it not right that they who get the benefits should pay for those benefits? It seems like we have lost all sight of right and justice or of the moral question involved in levying taxes under a protective tariff. Why, my friends, down in Mississippi, in the Delta region, where they are shutting off the Mississippi River overflows by levees, they have a tax levied upon the people whose lands are protected, upon the cotton raised at so much per bale, and is that not right? Would it not be wrong to levy a tax on the hill farms of Mississippi to build a levee to protect the river-bottom farms, the Delta lands? Yet they all get an indirect benefit from the fact that the Delta lands are increased in value and in productivity, and the State as a whole is benefited. Nobody, however, would tolerate the thought for a moment of levying a tax upon the whole State of Mississippi to protect the Delta farms.

But when it comes to levying a tax upon the whole people through a tariff in order that some portion of the people may pocket a profit they otherwise could not get, gentlemen of high morals defend in theory such a practice on the idea that it is indirectly beneficial. It is no more general and indirect than the levy taxes I have just mentioned.

A protective tariff tax has none of the usual objects and purposes of an ordinary tax levy. The object of protection is not to raise revenue, but to raise prices of domestic products manufactured within the tariff wall. Is that not true? It would not be protective if it did not, and you would not want it if it did not do so; you would not favor it if it did not do so. It does not fall within the category of ordinary levies of taxes. Taxes are levied to pay public expenditures, and public expenditures are those incurred for the benefit of the public. Profits to individuals or companies engaged in certain lines of industries are not the concern of the public taxpayer.

It is in reality a law in restraint of trade, and should be and is an unconstitutional enactment and ought to be and would be so held by the courts if the real object and purpose of the levy was stated on the face of the statute. Our friends talk about raising revenue and say we have to raise a revenue. It is true we have to raise revenue to run the Government. I want to say to you, however, we are under no compulsion or constraint to collect taxes by a tariff, hence even a tariff for revenue only is purely voluntary. Is that not true? Why, if we have other sources of taxation by which we can raise revenue and are not compelled to resort to duties on imports, but if we do as a matter of policy resort to such duties, should that resort not be justified by the revenue to be derived therefrom? Now, are not these truths? Are not they axiomatic? Does anybody controvert them? The whole basic claim of the protective tariff is for indirect purposes.

Protection is a matter of intent and does not depend upon the amount or the percentage of the levy. Why, we sometimes find gentlemen calling themselves Democrats, and they are—I do not question that—who have the belief that if the levy on an article is only 10 per cent or 15 per cent or 20 per cent that it is a revenue duty simply because the amount of the percentage of the levy is small. Why, a 10 per cent duty might be prohibitive on some articles, while 100 per cent might not be prohibitive on others. What is the object and purpose of my Democratic friends and my Republican friends in seeking a levy? Is it to get money or produce an increase in the value of the domestic product by reason of the levy, and if the intent and purpose of the levy is to increase the price of the domestic product—natural, agricultural, manufactured or otherwise—it is protective. The percentage is only a question of degree in the crime, if it is a crime. Now, my friends, gentlemen talk of the Robert J. Walker tariff and say the average was 25 per cent, if that was the average—I am only saying this, of course, as a matter of illustration—and they come to the conclusion that a tariff on anything that does not exceed the Walker rate is per se a revenue tariff. Why, sometimes I hear my friends scoring Republicans for levying only a 10 per cent tariff on diamonds. I have not investigated that subject, but I think gentlemen who have say that this is the greatest diamond-using country on earth, and if we put a levy much higher than that they will not come here at all, and so even 10 per cent becomes in the nature of things a revenue duty, as a higher rate would bring less revenue.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman pardon me——

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. The Republican Ways and Means Committee, in the last revision, considered the question of raising the duty on diamonds as a matter of revenue and was informed emphatically by the Board of Appraisers at New York that an increase over and above 10 per cent would be only an encouragement to smuggling, and it is purely on that ground that it was fixed at that rate. Not but that they are luxuries and the duty should be raised if it could be enforced, but the probabilities are we would collect less. Raising the duty above 10 per cent would put it at the point of diminishing returns rather than increasing them. That was solely the ground upon which the duty was fixed.

Mr. SIMS. I accept the gentleman's statement as correct. I want to say to the gentleman right now, however, if diamonds were being mined in this country the mine owners in this country would come to your committee and say they could not mine diamonds with American labor in competition with the mine owner of Africa unless you gave them a duty on diamonds sufficient to compensate for the difference in cost of production here and in Africa.

Mr. HILL. I hardly think it is true. Mr. Chairman, I am trying to follow, as I always like to follow, the gentleman's remarks because they are always intelligent, and I would like to ask him this question: Would not the principles which the gentleman is now laying down compel absolute free trade, with no duties at all, but the revenue collected in some other way——

Mr. SIMS. Oh, not at all, not at all; the tariff on diamonds is a revenue tariff, because they are not produced here.

Mr. HILL. I am referring to the general principles which the gentleman has been laying down.

Mr. SIMS. I will refer to that when I come to it.

Mr. HILL. Very well.

Mr. SIMS. But my Republican friends have decided that the tariff should be equal to the difference in the cost of production abroad and here, with an additional protection that guarantees a reasonable profit on the investment, as I understand it. Is that correct?

Mr. HILL. That is the language, of course, but it does not amount to anything, for, as I have said three or four times on this floor, it makes no difference in determining the difference in the cost of production abroad and at home whether you add a profit or deduct a like profit from the foreigner; it is simply a question of equalization in their cost.

Mr. SIMS. Well, the idea, as I understand it, is that the American manufacturer should be enabled to manufacture his goods in competition with foreign labor——

Mr. HILL. That is it, exactly.

Mr. SIMS. Or the foreign cost of production, whatever it may be.

Mr. HILL. Equalizing the difference in the cost of production.

Mr. SIMS. And it must be such that he can follow the business profitably in this country, and, naturally, that includes the interest on his capital.

Mr. HILL. In both cases.

Mr. SIMS. In both cases. If interest on borrowed money is lower abroad on the average than it is here, then the Republican theory means that we levy a tariff to equalize the difference in the interest cost of borrowed capital abroad and here. Is that true?

Mr. HILL. That is my doctrine.

Mr. SIMS. That is the gentleman's doctrine, and nobody knows protection doctrine better than does the gentleman. Now, my friends, do you tolerate such a doctrine? Do you believe in such a doctrine? Do you believe in the doctrine that banking capital per se must be made more profitable here by reason of a protective-tariff tax? Is that sound doctrine? I certainly think not.

But I want to say that such a doctrine or such a platform, literally and practically carried out, becomes practically prohibitive. If the tariff equals the difference in the cost of production abroad and here, including the difference in the cost of capital invested, including interest, then no foreign goods will come here at all, except when they are sold at a loss, because we make them equal to start on, and the foreigner has got to pay the freight, insurance, and other incidental expenses necessary to putting his goods here in competition with ours. So you have a doctrine that, if literally carried out, becomes prohibitive.

Why, discriminations in freight rates on heavy materials have absolutely destroyed some towns while building up others. I certainly think that when a great party gets away from fundamentals and adopts expedients, and nothing but expedients, and does not regard principle as binding and paramount in action, such a condition is much to be deplored.

Well, my friends on both sides are awfully in love with the farmer. And do you know why? In the first place, he is a very lovable citizen. They are the very best element, taken as a whole, of our population. They should be encouraged in doing what they have always done—being independent, self-sustaining, self-thinking, self-voting, self-governing. [Applause.] The pity I have heard poured out here in behalf of the farmer I do not believe is appreciated by him. I represent an agricultural district. Every county in my district is an agricultural county, and up to this time I have not even had a postal card from any farmer or anybody else in opposition to Canadian reciprocity. And yet the whole argument, or largely so—that is, the effective argument or the one that is intended to be effective—has been that the agreement will hurt the farmer.

Here is an article that I want to read to you myself, because I wish to comment a little upon it as I read, that I cut from the Washington Post of yesterday. It is not an editorial in that paper, but an interview with a gentleman who ought to know. It says:

TWENTY-SIX THOUSAND AUTOS TO FARMERS.

The Reo Motor Co.'s president quotes interesting figures.

Listen about these impoverished, down-trodden farmers, on account of whom you do not dare open the gates of Canada, because of their inability to compete with wheat grown in the frozen zones of the North, where they say it is sometimes 10 cents a bushel cheaper than it is over here. Listen to what this gentleman says about the condition of the farmer. I am glad it is true. He says:

That the farmer should eventually have come to his own in this country, as disclosed by the latest report of the United States Bureau of Statistics, is a matter of natural rejoicing, for to him we look principally for our food and for the raw material from which our wearing material is made.

Says Mr. R. E. Olds, president of the Reo Motor Car Co.:

A careful compilation of all the available returns at this time shows that during the year 1910 approximately 26,000 automobiles were purchased by American farmers, which is an increase over 1909 of 85 per cent and 400 per cent over the motor cars which farmers purchased during 1908.

I see my lovable friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], who dealt in jeremiads the other day about the farmers of Pennsylvania, who have railroads at their doors and a market for their products, but who were here bemoaning what would be their awful condition because Canada might sell a bushel of oats here in competition with them.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly; for a talk, but not for a speech.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Tennessee a moment ago said he represented a district which was wholly a farming district. The gentleman knows, for I have stated it here, that I represent a district that is wholly industrial, there not being a single acre of ground, unless it be a park, that is not improved; and I say to the gentleman, in view of the statement that he has made, that no Representative in Congress nor any individual delights more to observe that the farmer is coming into his own and is able to ride in automobiles than the gentleman who represents in part that great industrial district of Philadelphia. I believe it is time for the farmer to have automobiles. I am glad he is getting them, because we make them for him, and I wish the day would come when he might have them to pass down to his children, because we get the raw material from him with which to build them and then turn them back to him. Surely he ought to have the opportunity to use them. The regret I have is that possibly, by reason of a change in political conditions, we may not be able in our community to earn sufficient to buy from the farmer that which he now produces, so as to enable him to buy from us the automobiles that he uses.

Mr. SIMS. You represent those who manufacture these automobiles?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Very largely, yes; and we get our raw materials from you.

Mr. SIMS. No; you do not.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. My dear friend from Tennessee, there is not a thing that enters into the construction of an automobile, which we turn into the thing of beauty and utility that it is, that does not come out of the soil which your farmers till. We get the wood, we get the ore, we get the leather. We get all those things from you——

Mr. SIMS. Now, the gentleman from Philadelphia is making a beautiful speech, which will damage mine by way of comparison of his beautiful language with mine; but, my friend, are not your manufacturers willing to let us reduce the tariff on the materials entering into an automobile so that the farmer can buy them still lower? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If there is any inequality in the price or any unfair charge, I shall be glad to have that regulated.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman is dodging the question.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Not at all.

Mr. SIMS. Yes. Is the gentleman willing to reduce the tariff on the parts of automobiles and the materials out of which they are made, to the end that the farmer may buy them cheaper?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Not if it reduces the wages of the people who make them in my district.

Mr. SIMS. We will come to that in a few minutes, and I will ask the gentleman a few questions about that. Now, let me read further what this gentleman says:

These facts indicate that the American farmer is raising maximum crops, which he can readily market at the highest prices known in several decades, if, indeed, not in our entire history. In fact, his income for 1910 will aggregate fully $9,200,000,000, which is the largest amount of farm products raised in one year by any country in the world.

Where are my insurgent friends from the Northwest? Will they hold their heads up for a moment? Nine billion two hundred million dollars in one year, and yet you are afraid they will be put out of business by the cold, frozen regions of the north that can not raise anything except wheat. Now do not you feel as though you were trying to humbug us? But our people will not be humbugged and they will not be misled. I have not had one letter expressing any fears of that kind. If there happened to be some protected industry interested in opposing this legislation that would cultivate the fears of the farmers of my district, or create those fears where they do not exist, I would have been loaded down with literature, just as some of you gentlemen have been. The gentleman from Philadelphia represents in part one of the first manufacturing cities in the world, and I want to say, I think, financially one of the best cities in the world. They make their money there. They do not gamble for it on the cotton and stock exchanges, unless they go over to New York to do it. They have practically nothing of that sort at home; but there are gentlemen there who are interested in every form of manufacture that is protected in the gentleman's district, and so the gentleman is bemoaning the condition of the farmers of his State. But my friend I am sure does not want to deceive them. They are the best-off people on the face of the earth to-day and who have not received any benefit from protection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I know the gentleman always intends to be fair and just.

Mr. SIMS. I want to be.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Tennessee did not hear the gentleman from Pennsylvania bemoan the condition of the farmers in his State. If there was one thing that I endeavored to prove, it was that the farmers in Pennsylvania were prosperous, and that their prosperity depended largely upon the prosperity of the men in the mills. We are proud of our farmers.

Mr. SIMS. Let me read further from what this gentleman says:

Being a well-read man on all subjects that pertain to the management, progress, and development of his farm, it was but natural that the American farmer early began to study the relative merits and advantages of the horse and the automobile, and now that his verdict is overwhelmingly in favor of mechanical power as against animal power, it would seem that the motor-car industry is certain to gain a new impetus therefrom that it could gain in no other way.

I suppose our Kansas friends are all out praying for more help for bleeding Kansas. [Laughter.]

Fifteen years ago the gross incomes from the Kansas farms were $113,000,000; 10 years ago they amounted to $180,000,000; and in 1910 to $323,000,000.

And yet Canada is going to swamp Kansas if it gets a chance.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SIMS. I will.

Mr. HILL. Does the gentleman understand that the first clause in this bill covering farm wagons, farm carts, and all other agricultural implements of every kind or character, including tools, whether specified or not, would include the motor carts for farm purposes?

Mr. SIMS. I do not know and—that is not all—I do not care. Being opposed to the principle of protection per se, I do not care how many things come in by construction of this language.

Mr. HILL. I am a good deal interested in the question of revenue, and I want to know whether it is going to take these things in. I ask the gentleman the question in good faith, to get the gentleman's understanding of it.

Mr. SIMS. To give the gentleman an honest answer, I will say that I have not studied the bill.

Mr. HILL. But the gentleman is going to vote for it?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. HILL. The gentleman is going to vote for it, anyway?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. HILL. Whether it has any effect on the revenue or not?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. HILL. I would like to ask the gentleman whether this bill is a bill for a tariff for revenue or a tariff for protection or a tariff for free trade?

Mr. SIMS. The present bill? Why, on its face it is a free-trade bill, as far as it goes.

Mr. HILL. I did not know whether the Democratic Party had abandoned the tariff for revenue only.

Mr. SIMS (reading):

While these figures indicate that Kansas and her sister States are prosperous, the best evidence of wealth of the farmer is found in his bank deposits, which to-day challenge the admiration of every financier in the country. These conditions certainly testify to the American farmer's intelligence, industry, thrift, progress, and business acumen.

Where are my friends on that side who have been scared to death about wheat coming over from Canada? The only gentleman I see present is my distinguished friend from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], and he is almost out of hearing distance. Now, let him listen:

I recall how a score or more of wealthy wheat farmers living near the village of Hardtner, Kans., not so long ago raised the money with which to grade and equip a 10-mile road to connect with a point reached by two big railroad systems. This they did after one or two appeals to the railroads had failed. It cost them $100,000, and their trains are now hauling their wheat and other produce to market. It is one of the few independent railroads in this country free from bonds or debt of any kind. And now, I am reliably informed, the two big systems with which it connects are dickering with the farmers for the purchase of their line.

With brains, push, and pluck of this sort among our farmers it never has surprised me that our sales have increased so phenomenally in the prosperous agricultural sections of this country during the past three or four years.

Now, I know that if these gentlemen had been here listening they would all go away happy. When they see by the statistics from their own bureau, by the statements and comments on the same by the president of a large manufacturing company that their condition is unparalleled, and you must admit that so far the tariff has not benefited agricultural products because a large surplus is sold abroad. I asked the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], who is a candid man and tells the truth as he understands it, when he undertook to show that wheat was higher across the line from Canada than it was in the United States, if it was due to the existing tariff on wheat and he said it was.

Now, I want to ask anybody, inasmuch as a farm is not a manufactured product, inasmuch as wheat is an annual growth of the soil, cultivated by machinery, with perhaps the least labor cost of any crop grown on the farm, if that 10 cents a bushel—if that is what it was—higher in the United States than Canada is due to law, what do you think about such law? What do you think of a law that will tax the bread of life, the crumbs of poverty, in order to raise the price of wheat 10 cents a bushel as an advantage to the most prosperous farmers in the country? What do you think of the morals involved in such a doctrine?

My friends, such morals would lead to the levy of a tax on the crumbs from Dives's table in order to make Lazarus buy bread and not eat crumbs. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] What do you think of this when you go to church and accept your Sunday-school assignment? What do you think of coming here and undertaking to raise the price on an essential and prime necessity of life in order that the property owner, the capitalist, and the manufacturer may pinch the stomach of hunger by taking an additional penny by way of tariff profits? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

If there was no other reason under heaven for voting for Canadian reciprocity than that it may make bread cheaper—which I am afraid it will not—it should command the support of every man who believes in doing unto others as he would have others do unto him.

One gentleman somewhere out in the Northwest—I do not remember his name—said that he lived in a town one-half of which was in Canada and the other half in the United States, and he knew that wheat was 10 cents higher on the American side than it was on the Canadian. Well, I suppose the boarding houses in that town are all on the Canadian side, as there is nothing to prevent people from going across and eating their dinner and lunches on the other side and coming back. My friends, you are going to keep a tariff wall raised equal to the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad, and applied without regard to the character of the production—to coal in the mine, to iron ore in the mine, to hides on the backs of the cattle. It was through the efforts of President Taft that we have free hides. He is entitled to the credit for it. He would not sign the bill unless we brought in a resolution putting hides on the free list. But let us carry this to its logical sequence. Let us suppose that we are in this town in Minnesota, one-half of which is in Canada—if that is where it is——

Mr. LOBECK. It is in North Dakota.

Mr. SIMS. In North Dakota; and let us suppose that there was a waterworks system on the American side and a waterworks system on the Canadian side. On account of labor on the American side being higher than on the Canadian side, and on account of the interest of capital being higher on the American than on the Canadian side, that water would be 10 or 15 per cent higher to the consumers on the American side than on the Canadian side. Suppose the Canadian water company goes over and proposes to the municipality on the American side that it serve them with water, just as good water as the American company serves, and that it will reduce the water rates 10 or 15 or 25 per cent, whatever the difference may be. Then the water company on the American side comes up and says: "Look here; we have to employ American labor, we pump our water with American labor, and we have got to pay a tariff upon the piping and upon the machinery. The American scale of wages is higher and the interest on our capital is higher, and in order to equal the difference in the cost of production of water in Canada and the United States you must not let the water come in without a tax, without a license fee that will equal this difference." What do you think of the morals involved in such a proposition as that? Is there a gentleman here who would vote against the Canadian company serving water in the United States, providing the company on the side of the United States would not reduce its prices? Is water more of a necessity than bread? You can not live without either, or some substitute. Is it any more necessary than the necessary food products of life? Yet, if gentlemen had the political power to influence that, they would put a tax on the Canadian water, all for the benefit of the laboring man—nothing for the drinking man.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. BUCHANAN. In the case the gentleman has described there, he never heard any of our protection friends speak of putting any protection on labor, has he? Is it not a fact that labor could go across the line from Canada and the Canadians could come across and work for the American manufacturer at any price they thought fit?

Mr. SIMS. I understand that to be the case, but all excuses so far for a protective tariff have been based on labor. Nobody pays labor any more than labor asks. As a rule nobody pays any more for labor than they can get it for, and the farmer—although he is the bone and sinew of the country—if he rents his land at a certain rental value and the price of products goes up he raises the rent, does he not? Why, down in Mississippi, in the cotton-producing sections, they used to rent the land at so many pounds of lint cotton per acre. The low prices of cotton that came in with the McKinley administration in 1898, when cotton sold lower than at any other time before or since, the farmers made a change from a quantity of product produced to a money rent. What did they do it for? To help labor? No; to help themselves. Cotton had gone so low that the number of pounds of rent cotton did not bring what they regarded as a reasonable rent. They put a money rent on their lands, and if it took the whole crop to raise the money rent they had to pay it just the same. That is what the farmer did, and that is what the manufacturer will do. That is what all men will do generally. Cotton has now gone up very high, and instead of renting the land out at the usual money rent they used to get, they have raised the money rent from $5 or $6 per acre to as high as $10 per acre. Now, the manufacturer does the same thing. Nearly everybody will do the same thing under the same conditions.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. SIMS. My time is nearly out; I have not got a great deal more time, otherwise I would yield to the gentleman. Now, Mr. Chairman, I see my time is going faster than I would like. I hope the gentleman from Alabama will give me a little more time, because I have something else that I desire to say.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield the gentleman 10 minutes additional.

Mr. SIMS. That is in addition to what I have, as my time has not yet expired. Mr. Chairman, we might as well speak of the facts that are now present and are going to be present. Whenever there is a prospect or probability of reducing tariff levies naturally imports are retarded, and consequently collections through the customhouses are always less when there is a possibility of reduced duties. That is perfectly natural. On the other hand, if there is tariff legislation passed like there was in 1897, which was to increase duties, imports are tremendous, and consequently customs revenues are very large. Now, the fact is that the people have said by their votes that the existing tariff law is too high and they want it reduced, and we are going to try to do it.

Naturally the importers are going to hesitate and not bring in goods, and revenues will go down temporarily and will remain so for a certain length of time, naturally, after the law takes effect, until after what is called a business adjustment takes place. So our receipts from duties are going to be less. We can not help it; it works that way naturally and can not be avoided. How are we going to meet the situation?

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman, on that point, answer this question?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. HILL. Revenues will go down because duties are going to be reduced. How are you going to increase the revenues on these articles in this bill?

Mr. SIMS. We are not trying to increase them.

Mr. HILL. They never will increase; no matter if the importations increase, you could not get any revenue out of——

Mr. SIMS. That is, on this bill.

Mr. HILL. And this bill covers two or three billions of consumption.

Mr. SIMS. We are proposing to reduce duties all along the line. This is only a beginning.

Mr. HILL. Of course, you get no revenue on the free list.

Mr. SIMS. I want to discuss the revenue question. Now, we all know that receipts from present sources are going to be reduced. My Democratic friends, I want you to think about this thing, as you have to meet it. I started out a moment ago by saying my friend from Connecticut does not play politics, but nothing would be better politically for the other side than to force a bond issue during a Democratic administration or Democratic rule in this House following a Democratic tariff bill. How are we going to avoid it? We can not reduce the tariff without at least temporarily reducing the income. What must we do? We must reduce the expenditures temporarily at least. Now, my friends, the little reduction we made here, a large one in the way of a percentage, in reducing the expenses of this House has been favorably received and commented upon throughout the country.

Mr. CULLOP. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. CULLOP. We will increase the revenues by reducing duties on other articles. The revenues now being prohibitive, we get no revenues, but by reducing the tariff on other articles we will increase the revenues.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman is entirely correct, but it takes time. In the first place, we can not get any additional revenue due to reduced taxes until the law is passed, and not then until business is adjusted to the new conditions. What we have done in reducing expenses is only an indication of what we will do if we do what we ought to.

Mr. CULLOP. Will the gentleman permit one suggestion there? Do just what Senator Aldrich said ought to be done—reduce the expenditures of the Government $300,000,000 a year, or 30 per cent of the whole cost of the Government as now administered. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SIMS. That is just what I am going to talk about. But we can not and ought not to cripple any necessary arm of the Government service. If we do, we will get crippled ourselves.

Now, there are four sources from which reductions can be made, but they must be made by the millions of dollars and not by a few hundred thousand. What are they? We may just as well face the situation. We have got to reduce the expenses of the military establishment by millions of dollars. Let the Democratic chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs begin to reduce his next military bill so as to save millions of dollars in his next appropriation. What next? We have got to save millions of dollars in naval appropriations. Nothing is going to hurt the Democratic Party worse than a bond issue to follow our control here. What else? You can reduce by millions of dollars the next river and harbor bill, and we have got to do it. We can reduce by many millions the next public-buildings bill, and we have got to do it. We can temporarily do without an enormous increase in the naval establishment in battleships and other forms of useless war equipment. We can reduce the military establishment. But there came knocking at this door in the last session of the last Congress a bill to put the National Guard on the national payroll, and I saw Democrats run from it like they would from a bear. They were afraid of the National Guard.

My friends, whatever the merit might be in the proposition, considered as a proposition, it is not the time to add the National Guard to the Army pay roll. Whenever the Democratic experiment of tariff reduction is put to actual test, into working order, and business relations have been established, and additional money comes in, we can then talk about liberal appropriations, because we will have something to appropriate.

But, as I said when I started out, we are not limited to a tariff tax. We can resort to other taxes, as we have resorted to other taxes. Internal revenue brings, I believe, something over $300,000,000. The corporation tax brought over $25,000,000 last year. Now, my friends, there is going to be a demand, I suppose, for the passage of a general pension bill to increase the pensions of the soldiers, which will run into many millions of dollars. I have no criticism to make of the motives behind it. There were not enough gentlemen to get an aye-and-no vote in opposition to the bill that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FULLER] presented in the last Congress. If we are going to increase any kind of an expenditure by millions of dollars, we have got to raise revenue by millions of dollars to meet it.

Now, there is going to come business stagnation; it will be impossible to avoid it. Now, my friends, I want to say to every one of you here on both sides of this House that if we pass a pension bill increasing the expenditures of the Government by millions of dollars, we have got to increase internal-revenue receipts. You may just as well get ready for it. If you want to pay the soldiers more than they are now getting, you will have to tax beer more than you are now taxing it.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. SIMS. In just a moment. Let me finish this first. You will have to tax intoxicating liquors more than you now tax them. You will have to tax incomes of corporations more than you are now taxing them. You will have to resort, possibly, and perhaps very justly, to a stamp tax. You may just as well get ready for it.

Now I will yield.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. I want to ask you if you really say that you are giving this money to the soldiers? Is that the proposition?

Mr. SIMS. It is in legal effect a gift. It is in the nature of a gratuity. In other words, the soldier is not rendering any contemporaneous service for it.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. I want to say to the gentleman that I do not consider it a gift. This is the first time I have heard it so stated.

Mr. SIMS. In legal contemplation it is in the nature of a gratuity and not an enforceable vested right.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. I would like to ask the gentleman if he is making an argument here that is going to lead us against the pension proposition? Does he argue for a revision of the revenue laws in order to prevent any change in the pension laws?

Mr. SIMS. I want to say to the gentleman from Indiana, in order to have a general pension bill passed and to be received in good faith we ought to have the money with which to pay the pensions, and we have got to get it by an increase in the internal revenues.

And, if we have a bond issue, the votes that will be controlled one way or the other by a pension bill will not amount to enough to offset those that we lose by the bond issue. I will not vote for it. Let me tell you why.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. If the gentleman is speaking in his own behalf, I do not care to continue the discussion. If he is speaking for the Democratic Party, I should like to ask him a question.

Mr. SIMS. Everything I have said is for myself.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. I am perfectly willing that the gentleman should vote any way he wants to.

Mr. SIMS. I know as a rule it has been the policy here to avoid saying anything about pensions by gentlemen from the South. The reason was that we were afraid our motives would be misunderstood. My friends, the South, in so far as the consumers pay the tax, are being taxed just like the North to pay these pensions. Is not that true? In addition to that we have locally the entire burden of the Confederate pensions to bear, as you do not help to bear any of it. I do not blame you for it. I would vote against a law to put Confederate soldiers on the pension roll to-day; but we have got that burden to bear and it takes money to do it. We have to bear that burden all by ourselves and we have to help you equally to bear your burden, when you get practically all of the benefit of it. Do you blame me for saying that if we pass a pension bill we must provide additional internal-revenue taxes with which to meet the charge, because you can not do it by a reduced tariff in time to meet the additional increased pension burdens?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. SIMS. I am sorry, because my subject has not half expired.

Mr. DALZELL. I yield one hour to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE].

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, the tariff in this country is and has been always a political question. There has been more or less suggestion of taking it out of politics and dealing with it scientifically. It is possible and probable that we will gradually adopt a more perfect and scientific method of determining schedules, so as to more correctly represent the difference in cost of production in this country and abroad, but the question will continue to be a political one for at least during this generation, and the two old parties will, as they have done heretofore, differ materially and fundamentally, one standing for protection, the other for free trade or a tariff for revenue only.

Both parties believe in raising at least a portion of the revenues for the support of the Government by imposing duties on products brought in from foreign countries. We differ somewhat, upon the class of articles upon which duties shall be levied and as to the rate of duty. The Democratic Party says that duties can only be levied for the purpose of raising revenue, while the Republican Party favors a tariff that will not only yield revenue for the support of the Government, but also that it shall be so adjusted as to promote the establishment and maintenance of our industries and to protect our labor against the cheap labor of foreign countries.

The platform of the Democratic Party adopted in 1892 I think correctly states the position of that party upon the tariff question. It is as follows:

We denounce Republican protection as a fraud. We declare it to be a fundamental principal of the Democratic Party that the Federal Government has no constitutional power to impose and collect tariff duties except for the purpose of revenue only.

In our last platform we limited the rate of duty to be levied so that it should be measured by the difference in cost of production at home and abroad, allowing for a reasonable profit. For myself, Mr. Chairman, I believe the Republican Party has the advantage of position, and for one I propose to resist to the last any proposition that suggests free trade.

I care not from whence it comes or by what name it may be labeled, whether it be so-called Canadian reciprocity or a farmers' free-trade bill, confident that the ultimate judgment of the intelligent people that I have the honor in part to represent in this body will sustain me in that position, and that the people of the whole country will again declare in favor of the Republican policy of protection, as they have always done when the issue has been between protection and free trade. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Chairman, I am a Republican because I am a protectionist. I believe in protection and in its fundamental principles. I am one of those who believe in the doctrine of protection as taught and advocated by William McKinley, who for so many years honorably and ably served as a Member of this body, and who later filled the high office of President with great distinction, giving to the people an administration that inspired confidence and restored prosperity to the country, and it can probably be reliably stated that in his official utterances and acts he contributed more to establish permanently the Republican policy of protection in this country than any other man during the last 50 years.

It happens, Mr. Chairman, that 21 years ago, in the Fifty-first Congress, there was being debated in this Chamber a bill known as the McKinley bill. Mr. McKinley, as the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, reported that bill. In debating it on the floor of the House he said some things that it seems to me should be repeated and injected into this debate, because he described a condition that prevailed after 29 years of a policy of protection that still continues. He defined what protection does and what it is, and I think it very appropriate to quote briefly from that speech. Speaking of what protection has done, Mr. McKinley said:

We have now enjoyed 29 years continuously of protective-tariff laws—the longest uninterrupted period in which that policy has prevailed since the formation of the Federal Government—and we find ourselves at the end of that period in a condition of independence and prosperity the like of which has never been witnessed at any other period in the history of our country, and the like of which has no parallel in the recorded history of the world. In all that goes to make a nation great and strong and independent, we have made extraordinary strides. In arts, in science, in literature, in manufactures, in invention, in scientific principles applied to manufacture and agriculture, in wealth and credit and national honor, we are at the very front, abreast with the best and behind none.

In 1860, after 14 years of a revenue tariff, just the kind of a tariff that our political adversaries are advocating to-day, the business of the country was prostrated, agriculture was deplorably depressed, manufacturing was on the decline, and the poverty of the Government itself made this Nation a byword in the financial centers of the world.

We had neither money nor credit. Both are essential; a nation can get on if it has abundant revenues; but if it has none, it must have credit. We had neither as the legacy of the Democratic revenue tariff. We have both now. We have a surplus revenue and a spotless credit.

We lead all nations in agriculture, we lead all nations in mining, and we lead all nations in manufacturing. These are the trophies which we bring after 29 years of a protective tariff. Can any other system furnish such evidences of prosperity? Yet in the presence of such a showing of progress there are men everywhere found who talk about the restraints we put upon trade and the burdens we put upon the enterprise and energy of our people. There is no country in the world where individual enterprise has such wide and varied range and where the inventive genius of man has such encouragement.

There is no nation in the world under any system where the same reward is given to the labor of men's hands and the work of their brains as in the United States. We have widened the sphere of human endeavor and given to every man a fair chance in the race of life and in the attainment of the highest possibilities of human destiny.

WHAT FREE TRADE WILL DO.

To reverse this system means to stop the progress of the Republic and reduce the masses to small rewards for their labor, to longer hours and less pay, to the simple question of bread and butter. It means to turn them from ambition, courage, and hope to dependence, degradation, and despair. No sane man will give up what he has got, what he is in possession of, what he can count on for himself and his children for what is promised by your theories.

Free trade, or, as you are pleased to call it, "revenue tariff," means the opening up of this market, which is admitted to be the best in the world, to the free entry of the products of the world. It means more, it means that the labor of this country is to be remitted to its earlier condition, and that the condition of our people is to be leveled down to the condition of rival countries, because under it every element of cost, every item of production, including wages, must be brought down to the level of the lowest paid labor of the world. No other result can follow, and no other result is anticipated or expected by those who intelligently advocate a revenue tariff. We can not maintain ourselves against unequal conditions without the tariff, and no man of affairs believes we can.

Under the system of unrestricted trade which you gentlemen recommend we will have to reduce every element of cost down to or below that of our commercial rivals or surrender to them our own market. No one will dispute that statement, and to go into the domestic market of our rivals would mean that production here must be so reduced that with transportation added we could undersell them in their own market, and to meet them in neutral markets and divide the trade with them would mean that we could profitably sell side by side with them at their minimum price.

First, then, to retain our own market under the Democratic system of raising revenue by removing all protection, would require our producers to sell at as low a price and upon as favorable terms as our foreign competitors. How could that be done? In one way only, by producing as cheaply as those who would seek our markets.

What would then entail? An entire revolution in the methods and condition and conduct of business here, a leveling down through every channel to the lowest line of our competitors; our habits of living would have to be changed, our wage cut down 50 per cent, or upwards, our comfortable homes exchanged for hovels, our independence yielded up, our citizenship demoralized.

These are conditions inseparable from free trade; these would be necessary if we would command our own market among our own people, and if we would invade the world's markets harsher conditions and greater sacrifices would be demanded of the masses. Talk about depression, we would then have it in its fullness. We would revel in unrestrained trade. Everything would, indeed, be cheap, but how costly when measured by the degradation that would ensue. When merchandise is cheapest, men are the poorest, and the most distressing experiences in the history of our country—aye, in all human history—have been when everything was the lowest and cheapest measured by gold, for everything was the highest and the dearest measured by labor. We want no return of cheap times in our own country. We have no wish to adopt the conditions of other nations. Experience has demonstrated that for us and ours and for the present and for the future the protective system meets our wants, our conditions, promotes the national design, and will work out our destiny better than any other.

With me this position is a deep conviction, not a theory. I believe in it, and thus warmly advocate it, because enveloped in it are my country's highest development and greatest prosperity; out of it come the greatest gains to the people, the greatest comforts to the masses, the widest encouragement for manly aspirations, with the highest rewards, dignifying and elevating our citizenship, upon which the safety and purity and permanency of our political system depend.

Mr. Chairman, I stated that it seemed to me to be appropriate and proper to inject into this debate so much of the speech of Mr. McKinley as I have just read, because after the lapse of 21 years the words uttered at that time apply with the same force to-day as they did then. A little later in our history we had another discussion in this Chamber when the question at issue was the tariff. In 1897, just 14 years ago now, that debate took place. We had in that Congress and on this side of the Chamber a gentleman, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, who was a great student of the principle of protection, Mr. Dingley, of Maine. Mr. Dingley, as the chairman of that committee, reported the Dingley bill and opened the debate in the House.

I am going to read a very brief statement from his speech, because it will apply with the same force now that it did when the speech was delivered 14 years ago.

Under the heading of "The problem before us," he said:

It is "a condition and not a theory which confronts us." Our problem is to provide adequate revenue from duties on imports to carry on the Government, and in imposing duties to secure this result to so adjust them as to secure to our own people the production and manufacture of such articles as we can produce or make for ourselves without natural disadvantage, and thus provide more abundant opportunities for our labor. For rest assured that no economic policy will prove a success unless it shall in some manner contribute to opening up employment to the masses of our people at good wages. When this shall be accomplished, and thus the purchasing power of the masses is restored, then, and not until then, will prices cease to feel the depressing effect of underconsumption, and the prosperity of our people rise to the standard of 1892.

The great secret of the prosperity of the United States up to 1893, especially after the resumption of specie payments in 1879, was the fact that our people were all at work at good wages, and thus had large purchasing power. It was this large consuming and purchasing power that made our markets the best in the world, that maintained prices at fair rates—in short, that made this country the admiration and envy of the world.

When, by first the anticipated and then partially realized overthrow of protection, industries were arrested, machinery stopped, wages reduced, and employees discharged through the transfer of the producing and making of part of what we had previously made to other lands, then the purchasing power of the masses was diminished and the demand for products decreased, and this gorged the markets, abnormally lowered prices, and prostrated industries and business.

He further said:

WISDOM GAINED IN THE HARD SCHOOL OF EXPERIENCE.

Mr. Chairman, the past four years have been enlightening, especially to candid investigators of economic problems. We have been attending a kindergarten on a gigantic scale. The tuition has come high, but no people ever learned so much in so brief a time. Hereafter theories, preached in however captivating language, will have to give way to the teachings of experience.

In observing this debate and in listening to the predictions that have been made on that side of the Chamber it has occurred to me that before you can get very far with the American people you must demonstrate by experience or by practice that your theories will do what you say they will. In some respects I wish that you could have your way at present and enact your theories into law, so far as the tariff question is concerned. The results would temporarily be a little hard on those of us who do not agree with you, but, in my judgment, it would again demonstrate that your theories are impracticable and that they would produce nothing but disaster to the industrial prosperity of the country.

Mr. Chairman, the same theories have been exploited, the same prophecies, the same declarations, and the same predictions have been made time and time again on that side of the House in years past that we have been listening to in this debate. In order that you may know what has been said on former occasions, I will furnish you with a few choice quotations from speeches delivered by one or two Democratic statesmen who are still preaching the doctrine of free trade; and in selecting speeches made in this Chamber when the question of the tariff was being debated I want to give you a few quotations from the speech of one who to-day is the recognized leader of his party—at least he is occupying a public position that is in importance next to the Presidency. I refer to the distinguished gentleman from Missouri, the present Speaker of this House. He has been a Member of Congress for a great many years, and unless he shall be successful in being promoted to a higher place, to which, I understand, he and his friends at present aspire, I hope he may continue to be a Member for a great many years to come.

Back in 1894 the Democratic Party was in control of this House, and for the first and only time in the history of the country for a period of 50 years your party was not only in control of this House, but in control of both branches of Congress and also the Executive. You were in a position to do what you desired to do; you had it your own way. During the Congress that met in 1894 your party in control brought into the House a bill proposing to repeal the McKinley Act and to enact in its place what subsequently became known as the Wilson-Gorman Act. The distinguished Speaker of the present House took quite a prominent part in the debate on that occasion, and for fear some of you gentlemen may become too much excited over the prophecies that are being made on that side of the House in this debate that are so generously applauded, apparently laboring under the impression that they are original, I want to give you some of the prophecies and predictions made by your distinguished Speaker in 1894, and I am going to do so for the purpose of suggesting to you that if he was mistaken in the predictions that he made and that you are now repeating, possibly you may be mistaken. Referring to the Wilson bill, he said:

Its free-trade portion is its saving grace.

In other words, he declared in favor of actual free trade. Then he stated—and I apprehend from his speech there must have been something said about this Wilson bill on this side of the House, just as there has been in this debate with reference to the pending bill:

With all the faults which gentlemen have pointed out, the Wilson bill is the best revenue measure since the days of Robert J. Walker. The Republicans offered the American people a continuation of the McKinley bill, with all the miseries which it entails. On the other hand, we offer them cheaper clothing, cheaper fuel, cheaper homes, cheaper medicines, cheaper furniture, and cheaper necessaries of life.

In this debate we have substantially these statements about the benefits from free trade and how the cost to the consumer is going to be lowered without affecting the price to the producer. Referring to those who have to labor, he stated:

To them we offer steadier employment at more remunerative wages.

Well, you passed this bill and it became a law. How did it operate in practice; how did it affect the laborer; how did it affect the wages that he received, if he was fortunate enough to get any employment and receive any wages?

In the same speech he said:

I am in favor of the Wilson bill because it will unseal the fountains of our prosperity, unfetter the wheels of our factories, rekindle the fires in our furnaces, lift a heavy load from agriculture, set the woodman's ax to ringing, start the plow in fields now lying fallow, revive the music of the mechanic's hammer, and unfurl the sails of our commerce.

I am in favor of the Wilson bill because it will render our laborers independent freemen and the eager patrons of our merchants and our farmers, which God intended them to be, and not the ragged habitues of soup houses, to which pitiable condition a protective tariff has reduced them.

Why, my friends, do you think that you are the discoverers of the declarations which you have been making in this debate? They have been made in this House time and time and time again.

There is nothing new in them. You can not fool the American people any longer by such declarations and predictions.

And then he stated:

I am in favor of the Wilson bill, not because it is all my fancy had painted a Democratic revenue measure, but because it contains much that is good and forever rids us of much that is bad.

After we had had three or four years of that law which he was eulogizing, the American people were very glad of the opportunity to repudiate it, and they did repudiate it, and for all the years that have passed they have not shown any desire to want to return to such times as prevailed during the existence of the Wilson-Gorman Act.

He said further:

I am in favor of the Wilson bill because it will carry increased comfort and joy to 13,000,000 homes and ameliorate the condition of 65,000,000 American citizens.

What do you think of that prediction?

I want you to note this ridiculous statement that he made:

We put every constituent element of a house on the free list or cut it down materially. Suppose it reduces the cost of houses by one-third or one-fifth the present cost? What then? As certain as two and two make four, there will be more houses built, for we are a home-loving, home-making people. That means more employment to architects, carpenters, bricklayers, plasterers, quarrymen, stonemasons, hod carriers, painters, glaziers, paper hangers, decorators, teamsters, lightning-rod men, and insurance agents.

That, my Democratic friends, was the prediction of your distinguished Speaker as to the effect the Wilson bill would have in encouraging home building and the employment of labor, and instead of working out in practice as he predicted, it had exactly the opposite effect.

And then he went on and said:

The people thoroughly detest the system which has made enforced idlers, unwilling loungers, and discontented tramps of brave, honest, industrious men, who naturally shrink from beggary as from the smallpox or the black pleague.

Mr. Chairman, I am not going to quote further from the speech of the distinguished gentleman, made in 1894, on the Wilson bill, because I want to quote from some of his speeches made a little later, in March, 1897, when the Dingley bill was under consideration. He had considerable to say in that debate, and I will quote a few expressions therefrom:

Mr. Chairman, as an American citizen, in sympathy with the great body of the people and with five persons whom it is my duty and pleasure to support—

I assume that he was a member of the minority of the Committee on Ways and Means—

I am dead against this bill. It is a vicious, a monstrous, and an unnecessary measure. As a Democratic politician, I rejoice at its passage. You are delivering yourselves into our hands. This bill in the days to come will compel every merchant in the land, Democrat, Republican, or Populist, to make a Democratic stump speech every time he sells an article over the bargain counter. And unless the Senate amends this bill largely for the better, I have no doubt that in the next Congress we will have a hundred majority in this House, and that in 1900 we will elect our candidate for the Presidency, and the people will come into their own again.

That was in 1897. He made the prophecy that in 1900 there would be 100 Democratic majority in this House, that the Democratic Party would succeed in electing a President, and yet they did not succeed in electing either the House or a President until the election of 1910, when they did succeed in getting a majority in this House. In other words, 13 years passed, and yet that prediction failed to come true, and it has not come true yet as to the election of a President.

Referring to the Wilson-Gorman bill, he said:

The trouble with the Wilson-Gorman bill was not that it contained too much free trade, but that it did not contain free trade enough.

Have you ever thought, my friends, what we would have had had that bill contained more than it did of free trade?

The thing that condemned it in public estimation was that it fell far short of the promises of the Democratic platform in 1892. The free traders in the Fifty-third Congress voted for it, with all its sins upon its head, holding our noses while we voted. We voted for it for an all-sufficient reason that, bad as it was, it was an improvement on the McKinley bill of abominations.

I suppose that when he made that statement he had reference to the bill as it came from the Senate, with some 600 to 800 amendments, which the House accepted by adopting a motion to concur. He says they held their noses when they did so, and yet his objection to it was that it did not contain enough free trade.

In that speech he predicted disaster to the country if the Dingley law should be enacted, and he denounced in pathetic terms the effect it would have upon the farmers of the country, and stated it would mean a raise of 25 per cent on everything the farmer uses in his business.

I want to particularly call your attention to the following statement of his, with reference to the farmer and how he gloried in his free-trade belief and boasted of the record of his party made in the House in 1894. It is as follows:

He can not raise wheat, corn, oats, barley, and hay now at a profit. In what condition will he find himself when he gets no more for his products, for, tariff or no tariff bill, he must still sell his stuff in the open markets of the world in competition with pauper labor.

I do not propose for any protectionists to define the principles of free traders. I am a free trader and I glory in the fact. I rejoice in the record that we free traders made in the House in 1894, in the Fifty-third Congress. I repeat, so that all men may hear, that I am a free trader and proudly take my stand with Sir Robert Peel, Richard Cobden, John Bright, and Henry George. I may be an humble member of that illustrious company, but it is better to be a doorkeeper in the house of honest free traders than to dwell in the tents of wicked protectionists.

In describing what happened to the Wilson bill after it left the House and went to the Senate, he said:

But when it reached the other end of the Capitol it was so cut, carved, mangled, disfigured, and doctored that its granddaddy would not have recognized it had he met it face to face in the big road.

And yet he and his Democratic colleagues in the House voted to accept it in its mangled condition. In his speech of March 26, 1897, he referred to President Cleveland, the only Democratic President his party has had in 50 years, and denounced him as not being a Democrat. I can not imagine why he should have repudiated him, unless it was that he did not approve the Wilson-Gorman bill, and perhaps it was because he denominated it an act of "perfidy and dishonor." Speaking of Mr. Cleveland, he said:

Grover Cleveland is not a Democrat. As a Democrat, bred and born, understanding its tenets, loving its traditions, ready always and everywhere to battle for its principles, I solemnly declare that he never was a Democrat.

On the 6th of March, 1893, in his first official act, he startled all the Democrats in the land, and a great many Republicans, by appointing to the highest office within his gift a soreheaded Republican.

On March 31, 1897, during the discussion of the McKinley bill, he made the statement that has so often been quoted in the House as defining his position relative to the customhouses, and which I think was quoted by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] in his speech this afternoon. I refer to this statement:

If I had my way to-day, sir, I would tear them all down from turret to foundation stone, for from the beginning they have been nothing but dens of robbers.

In that same speech, referring to the Republicans on this side of the Chamber, he stated:

But you will be brought to your senses when the people again get a shot at you in the year of our Lord and Master 1898.

The RECORD shows that when he made that statement there was loud laughter and demonstration on the Democratic side of the House, just as there has been applause when many declarations of a similar character have been made on that side in this debate. He concluded his speech of denunciation in the following words:

By the eye of faith I can see a million bicyclers, with pneumatic tires, riding down protection liars, because you are putting up the price of bicycles 35 per cent. The women of the land, God bless them, will make their husbands, sons, brothers, and sweethearts vote against you, because under the Dingley bill they have only one dress where they had two under the Wilson-Gorman bill.

Seven million farmers will dig you up with their hoes, plow you up with their plows, beat you with their mauls, hackle you with their harrows, hammer you with their sledges, rake you with their curry-combs, pulverize you with their disks, cut you down with their axes, split you to pieces with their frows, ride you on their barbed-wire fences, toss you with their pitchforks, grind you through their sausage mills, mow you down with their reapers, bind you up in great bundles, run you through their thrashing machines, and scatter you as worthless chaff because you are raising the price of all farming implements by 45 per cent.

Every patient forced to endure a surgical operation will loathe you because you have increased the tax on anæsthetics. Every lover of learning will detest you because you have laid a prohibitive tariff on books, thereby shutting the gates of knowledge so far as was in your power. Every child that dies of diphtheria will pass away pronouncing on you its lasting curse because you have put up the price of antitoxin. You are arraying against you every right-thinking man and woman in the land.

Since he, miscalled the Morning Star,
Nor man nor fiend hath fallen so far—as you will fall when the people of the United States find out the numerous monstrosities contained in this bill.

Whatever you may think of your distinguished Speaker, my Democratic friends, you must admit that he has not been much of a success as a political prophet.

Another, more conservative, but able and distinguished Democratic statesman, during the debate on the Dingley bill in 1897, in predicting the result of the enactment of the measure, and I refer to Mr. BAILEY, of Texas, now a Senator from that State, said:

If it can produce the good results which its authors prophesy it will, then the people ought to have the benefit of it as speedily as possible; and if it can not produce those results, then the sooner it is tried and found wanting the sooner it will be repealed and the sooner the people will be relieved of its unjust exactions. I warn you now, that if this bill fails—as fail it will—to bring the prosperity which the Republicans have promised, you will not live long enough to obtain a patient audience with the American people upon the absurd proposition that you can make them prosperous by increasing their taxes.

Looking at the question purely as one of partisan advantage, I have every confidence that the Democratic Party will profit by the bill which you have determined to pass, because I am confident that its enactment will not bring the relief which you have promised to the people.

Now, I say to you, my Democratic brethren, you have been false prophets in the past. In a period of 50 years you have only been in full control of the affairs of this Nation for one four-year term, namely, from 1893 to 1897. With the utter failure on your part to demonstrate that your theories would work out in practice in any particular, and in view of the great disaster that resulted from the enactment into law of your theories, it seems to me as if you had better be a little more conservative in declaring what you are able to do, and you had better wait until you have demonstrated that you can successfully administer the affairs of the country, and until you do so, in my opinion, you will be unable to obtain the confidence of the American people.

Mr. Chairman, I am now going to refer just briefly to the pending bill and also to the bill which was passed in the House a few days ago known as the Canadian reciprocity measure. I opposed that measure not so much because it did not go far enough or because it is unjust and unfair to the agricultural interests of the country, but because I believed it to be un-Republican. I believed it to be, as that side of the House, I think, has admitted, a Democratic measure. In any event, in the language of the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, it is the first step, as he says, toward the destruction of the principle of protection.

I am not going to repeat what I said when that bill was pending in the House, but I do want to refer to some speeches that have been made in this debate on this present bill by gentlemen who supported the Canadian reciprocity measure. Some of these gentlemen I congratulate. They are going to have the advantage of some of us regulars, because they are going to have an opportunity to distribute two speeches. In the next campaign they can circulate one speech among the farmers and another speech in the cities. In other words, they can go to their farmer constituents with the speech which they made against this bill, and then they can go to their city constituents with the speech that they made on the Canadian reciprocity measure.

There has been one speech made on the pending bill that I listened to with a great deal of interest, and it was a very able speech indeed. It was made by the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HARRIS]. I have listened to a good deal of the debate since this bill has been under discussion, and I do not know of any speech that impressed me more than that of the gentleman from Massachusetts. I congratulate him thereon. As I sat listening to his speech somebody remarked that he voted for Canadian reciprocity. I did not think that that could be possible, so I got the RECORD and referred to the vote, and, sure enough, it was shown that the gentleman voted for Canadian reciprocity.

Now, let me quote just a little from his speech and refer to two or three statements that I indorse. He said:

Mr. Speaker, I did not rise to engage in a general debate on the question of protection versus free trade. I content myself with saying that I am a protectionist, and desire to foster every industry that needs it in this country. [Applause on the Republican side.]

He said also:

I rose to say a few words, present a few figures, and show why the products of one industry should not be included in this or any other free list.

Now, my friends, that is not very consistent with his position in view of his vote on Canadian reciprocity. He said further:

If you destroy or seriously injure so great an industry, if you send our manufacturers to Canada and Germany and England, to make there, with the same machinery but with cheaper labor, and send in here free of all duty that which has been made here and has supported so many, what answer will you make to the abandoned and desperate body of workers, and what will you say to the farmer who loses so great a food market here at home when they ask you why you have done this thing? [Applause on the Republican side.]

I wonder if our Republican Massachusetts friends imagine that they can enjoy the benefits of protection on everything they produce and still take away every bit of protection that the farmers of the country have, and then expect that the farmers will continue to support them in giving protection to their industries on the mere suggestion that if our manufacturing industries are prospering then the farmer will have a good market and he does not need any protection on his products.

I want to serve notice on these gentlemen from some of these protected districts and some of these Republicans who come from Massachusetts who, I think, have been denominated as "Foss Republicans," that they have got to keep the faith in the future. I say to them you have got to meet us half way, or at least you have got to come part way, if you expect us to keep in the game. I want to remind you that you never would have had any McKinley law nor any Dingley law nor any Payne law if it had not been for the farmers of this country.

I appeal to you gentlemen who are advocating protection on what you manufacture to reciprocate if you want the farmers of the country to stand by your industries. Two years ago, when we had the Payne tariff bill under consideration, you wanted free hides. You had been clamoring for free hides for so many years that finally you brought about a revision of the tariff, and you got free hides, and the farmers and stock raisers of the country accepted it. They have gotten along; they have taken a little less price for their hides and shoes have advanced in price. And now what do you propose? You propose to take from the farmers the only protection they have on what they produce, and still you expect us here to vote with you to keep the protection upon what you manufacture. I want to give you one little quotation in regard to reciprocity, and what I think real reciprocity is.

In the earlier part of my remarks I quoted from the great speech made by Mr. McKinley in the Fifty-first Congress. I want to quote just a word that he said at that time for the reflection of some of our friends from these manufacturing districts:

No prosperity is possible to other industries if agriculture languish.

And then in that same speech he says on the subject of reciprocity:

From 1854 to 1866—12 years with reciprocity with Canada—we bought of them twice as much as they bought of us. Ninety-five per cent of their products came into the United States free of duty, while only 42 per cent of ours went into Canada free of duty. Mr. Chairman, what these other countries want is a free and open market with the United States. What we want, if we ever have reciprocity, must be reciprocity with equality, reciprocity that shall be fair, reciprocity that shall be just, reciprocity that shall give us our share in the trade or arrangement that we make with the other nations of the world.

It seems to me that is a very different kind of reciprocity than is proposed in the bill that we passed the other day.

I listened to the very able speech of my distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] yesterday, and he stated that these Canadian people were very much like us; that they live as we live; that they have the same thoughts; they think as we think; they speak the same language, and therefore we ought to extend to them the same advantages that we enjoy.

It has been stated by the friends of reciprocity and by the President, I may say, that conditions in this country and in Canada are similar. In other words, he says there is no substantial difference. Now, we maintain that there is a very substantial difference, both in the value of land, in the cost of labor, and in tariff advantages that Canada enjoys. I will not stop to enumerate them. They say that because there is no substantial difference we do not need any protection on agricultural products between this country and Canada. Now, I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], or some other gentleman that is in favor of reciprocity, if through the Tariff Board you should find that the cost of producing boots and shoes in the United States is substantially the same as in some foreign country—in other words, that there is no difference, either in the cost of labor or the cost of production; that it is just about a stand-off; in other words, no substantial difference—would you then say, you gentlemen from Massachusetts, that you would remove the duty on boots and shoes? Why, certainly not. And why not? Because you would call attention to the Republican platform adopted in 1908 and you would say that the proper measure of duty is the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad, with a reasonable profit. Now, you do not seem to think the farmer needs any profit, just so long as everything is about equal between Canada and the United States. They think the same, they speak the same language, they have the same ambitions, they are, as the gentleman from Illinois says, very much one and the same kind of people; therefore there ought not to be any more protection between us and them than there would be between Indiana and Illinois.

I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] and to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] and to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] and to every other gentleman who made a speech or voted in favor of Canadian reciprocity and now comes in here and makes a speech against this bill and says he is going to vote against it, that, so far as I am concerned, I hope there may be unanimous consent that their apologies may be accepted. [Applause on the Republican side.] In other words, if some of these gentlemen have seen the error of their way, you on this side of the House who voted for reciprocity in the last Congress, and who voted for reciprocity in the present Congress, being a minority of your party and for the time being insurgents—I believe that has been the term applied heretofore when some Republicans have refused to follow a majority of their party—it is proper, it seems to me, to say that you were insurgents, at least so far as your action on the reciprocity pact is concerned. Now, some of you voted for reciprocity who did not believe in it. You did not hesitate at all in private conversation to say that you were opposed to it. You even went so far as to denounce it. Many of you regretted that the subject was up for consideration and that you had to vote upon it, and you so stated.

So far as these persons are concerned, I am going to forgive them, regretting, of course, that they did not possess the courage of their convictions. To those who were seriously assaulting protection by supporting the Canadian reciprocity measure, speaking for myself, you can come back into the fold. Because you left and deserted the cause in one contest is not sufficient to justify me in abandoning my principles and my ideas on this question and voting for any free-trade measure. I may say, however, that if you persist in your efforts to take from the farmers that I have the honor of representing in this body their protection, you can very soon expect retaliation on my part, and we will try to see that you get a little of your own medicine.

Mr. Chairman, we are already realizing one effect from this so-called Canadian reciprocity, and that is the effect it is having by causing a large number of our farmers to leave this country and go to Canada. It seems to me that we had better legislate to encourage our own people to remain here and settle up and develop the unoccupied lands of the West and the abandoned farms of the East and South. Only this morning I saw in a leading daily newspaper published in Minneapolis, Minn., a dispatch from Winnipeg, stating how the farmers are rushing into Canada from the United States, and I want to read it for the information of the House:

UNITED STATES LOSES MANY FARMERS; 200,000 WILL TAKE LANDS IN WESTERN CANADA THIS YEAR.

WINNIPEG, April 29.

Canadian Northern officials estimate that 45,000 United States farmers will settle along the lines of its railway this year. The total immigration of American farmers to western Canada, they say, will be 200,000. Four hundred thousand acres will be thrown open for settlement along the company's lines this year. Beyond Edmonton 10,800 free homesteads have been opened for settlement, and a great rush of land seekers is reported for the Peace River Valley.

I suppose some of our good friends here would say that we ought to favor this legislation in order to make it easier for those of our people who go to Canada to reside, but I think for the present we had better legislate for our own country, not but what we wish every citizen of the United States who may go elsewhere Godspeed and the best of success.

I want to say a word to those on this side of the House who have in mind voting for this pending bill, not to forget that it is a Democratic free-trade measure. You want to remember that you were not sent here to vote for any Democratic tariff bills or to support the theories of that party. Do not say that you propose to vote for this bill as a protest against those representing a minority of Republicans because they may have voted for a free-trade measure on agricultural products. Remember that that bill has not yet been enacted into law, but is now pending in another body, and with the showing that will be made by the farmers throughout the country, who are actively preparing to appear in large numbers before the Senate committee having the bill under consideration, it may never be passed, and I am sure it never will if the Republicans at the other end of the Capitol stand firmly by their convictions. In any event, let us hope the bill will fail, at least that it may be very materially amended, and then we will again have an opportunity to pass upon it here.

Remember, my Republican friends, you have got to go into a campaign in 1912. You have got to defend your acts here and the acts of your party, and I say to you that you can not consistently, in my judgment, vote for this bill merely because you are a little angry at some of those Republicans, who thought they were helping their manufacturing districts, who left their party long enough to vote for a free-trade measure.

I look upon those gentlemen I have referred to a good deal as we look upon the sinner who repents, and you know it has been said there is more joy in Heaven over one sinner who repents than over ninety and nine just persons who need no repentance. [Laughter.]

Let us present the Christian spirit to our Republican sinning brethren who abandoned their principles and deserted us; let us forgive them, and inasmuch as they are now disposed to keep the faith, and by their speeches have indicated that they really are protectionists, let us stand with them, shoulder to shoulder, and to a man vote against this pending bill.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to discuss the provisions of this bill, but I find my time is expiring. It has been dissected by a number of gentlemen, particularly by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], and by my own colleague [Mr. MARTIN], and there is not much more to be said about it. It is bad in form, crude in substance, and has been brought in here without any consideration by any committee, without any hearings having been had upon it, and without any definiteness as to how much it will affect the revenues. I am a protectionist, and this bill is a free-trade measure, and that condemns it with me. Some have denominated it as a sort of a soothing-sirup proposition, while the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] suggested entitling it "A bill to fool the farmers and catch Democratic votes in 1912." When he made that statement, the distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON] proposed entitling it "A bill to repair damages," which might be a very good name for it.

There is no probability that the bill will ever become a law, and if there was, you gentlemen on that side of the House would never have brought it in here. It is a buncombe bill pure and simple, and one framed for the purpose of fooling the farmers of the country; but I want to say to you, my Democratic friends, that the American farmer of to-day is too well informed and is just as capable of knowing what is good for him as is any other citizen, and you can not fool him with any such claptrap or free-trade proposition as is embodied in the pending bill. The distinguished gentleman from Alabama, chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, in opening this debate, stated how it was expected the revenue that would be lost by this bill would be made up, and, among other things, he said that the Democratic policy of lowering the duties would increase importations and thereby produce an increase of revenue. To increase importations would certainly have but one effect, that of displacing a corresponding amount of home production, thereby affecting the labor of this country; and lowering duties has not heretofore increased revenues, and I would call the gentleman's attention to the record from 1893 to 1897, which shows our receipts were $200,000,000 less than our expenditures. In other words, your theories, as I have before stated, do not work out in practice, and whenever you have had an opportunity you have been unable to make good, and you will have some trouble in getting a majority of the people to support you in the next campaign if you continue enacting bills of the character of the bill now before the House. Do not be deceived by believing that the result of the last election is an indication that the American people are going to turn to your party. My opinion is that what you offered had but little to do with the results in many of the congressional districts in the last election. I think it was due more to the fact that the people were deceived by a hostile press as to the merits of the Payne-Aldrich tariff law, and for that reason they remained away from the polls. Others remained away because they were satisfied with existing conditions, and you will find, if you consult the election returns, that many districts represented in the last Congress by Republicans that are now represented by Democrats, that the vote cast in the district for the successful Democratic candidate is no greater than was cast in the former election when a Republican was successful. In other words, you will find that you did not increase your vote materially, but the trouble was in the loss of the Republican vote, due, I say, to the stay-at-home voters who have often been responsible for turning an election, especially in an off year.

I have not the time to discuss your proposed remedy for dealing with the trust question, but I do not believe we have anything to fear, as the people know that protection in this country is a good thing, and they are not going to abandon it and destroy the industries of the country generally by adopting free trade, merely for the sake of hitting a few corporations that may be denominated as trusts. Furthermore, the people know that during the four years your party was in power—from 1893 to 1897—you did not enact a line of legislation dealing with the trust question, neither did you take any action to enforce existing law affecting trusts and monopolies, and they also know that the Republican Party has enacted much law upon this subject, and that during this administration and the administrations that have preceded it many prosecutions have been successfully conducted against violators of the law, and many others are now pending, and the evil is being dealt with without affecting any legitimate industry or enterprise in the country.

If I was going to give you any advice, my Democratic friends, as to what you ought to do in order to be in the strongest position in the next campaign, it would be to suggest that you adjourn this session of Congress at the earliest practicable date and that you confine your efforts in the next session to making the necessary appropriations and adjourn early, because the less legislation you enact that represents your theories of government the greater your chances will be for success in the next election.

Mr. Chairman, I am sorry that my time has about expired, as I would like to have gone on and discussed many of these questions more in detail, but as I have but a moment I will conclude in just a word.

For a half century, with a brief interruption, the destinies of this Republic have been shaped by the Republican Party. For 14 years last past the uninterrupted control of the government of the departments has been intrusted to this party, and under its wise policies during these years the country has experienced an industrial development, and all classes of our people have enjoyed a degree of general prosperity, that has been without parallel in all history.

I believe these conditions are due largely to the Republican policy of protection, but in any event it can not be denied that they came about contrary to Democratic prophecies and predictions. The Republican policy of protection includes the Republican policy of reciprocity, and until the present time it has never been thought to be the part of wisdom to divorce the theories of the party in respect to these phases of its well-established policy. Hitherto these two policies have gone hand in hand and have been considered to be supplemental and not antagonistic to each other. Hitherto, when it has been proposed to apply the principle of reciprocity in a manner subversive of the principle of protection to American industry of whatever nature, the proposal has been promptly rejected.

The application of Republican principles of government, including its theories of reciprocity and protection, means opportunity for labor at good wages, markets for the products of the farms at prices which will enable the tillers of the soil to enjoy the comforts and luxuries of life enjoyed by citizens engaged in other pursuits, reasonable profits to the merchant and manufacturer, and safe and profitable investments for those who have to depend upon their savings to meet their daily living expenses.

Let us on this side of the Chamber have the courage to support the policies that are justified by experience and known to be conducive to the welfare and prosperity of our people. Let us also have the courage to resist all attacks of the opponents of the policy of protection in whatever form and from whatever source the opposition may come. In other words, let the Republicans of this body keep the faith that has been handed down to us from Lincoln to McKinley. [Prolonged applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER].

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, the charge is made repeatedly, and frequently believed, that the Democratic Party is weak in constructive ability; that it is a party of negation; that it lacks initiative and is wanting in that cohesiveness essential to prevent its falling into disorder and confusion in the face of responsibility. It is the "stock argument," the red flag, relied upon by the Republican spellbinder and press to frighten from the support of our policies the substantial business element of the country. Capital is cowardly and runs to cover at the first mention of danger. Our Republican friends, skilled in the arts of political warfare, are unfailing in their attempts to convince the public that Democratic success means business depression; that the Democratic Party is incapable of administering the affairs of this Government with that prudence and wisdom necessary to the successful conduct of an undertaking of such magnitude as involves the management of the varied and variable interests of more than 90,000,000 people. But if the potency of this time-worn charge is to be the chief reliance in the next campaign to cover up the sins of omission and commission of the Republican Party, the action of the majority of this House during the short time in which it has been in control must be a cause for unutterable chagrin and disappointment to those who expect to rely upon it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

A Democratic majority, within the brief period of less than a month, has effected such reforms as to command for us as a party the respect and confidence of the American people. We have done business in a business way. We have demonstrated beyond any question our ability to measure up to the responsibility placed upon us by the electorate of the country. We have shown not only our power of initiative, but our capacity for constructive work of the highest order. We have evidenced a sincerity of purpose in the work undertaken which must be gratifying to every patriotic citizen who desires a correction of the abuses which have grown up during the 16 years of Republican control of all branches of the Government.

But most gratifying of all, we have presented to the country the example of a great political party inspired with the single thought of doing the will of the people and strong in the power which comes of harmony of purpose and unity of action. There are no factional differences on this side of the Chamber; we know the purposes for which we have been commissioned and are moving forward in unbroken phalanx to their accomplishment. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Those who have sneered at the lack of cohesive strength of the Democratic Party have ceased to sneer, recognizing, as they have, that each individual of the party is willing to give up something of his own opinion for the success of the party which to him is synonymous with the good of the country. In this spirit of complete harmony, this singleness of desire, the party in this extraordinary session has been enabled to make a record for substantial constructive work unparalleled in the history of this or any other country. The most ardent partisan of the Republican faith will not dare the attempt to controvert this statement.

It is my purpose, Mr. Chairman, to review very briefly the legislation already enacted by the Democratic majority in this House, which is but an earnest of what will be done.

Ours is a representative Government—a Government of the people through their Representatives. This House is the popular branch of the Federal Congress. It is prescribed in the fundamental law that a Member of this House is the direct and immediate representative of a fixed number of people. It may be said that this House is, in fact, the entire American people assembled through their accredited agents to make such rules and regulations for their conduct as in their wisdom may be just and proper. It was designed by the fathers of the Constitution that this should be the forum in which the voice of the people might be heard and their will registered. In power, rights, and responsibility, each Representative is the peer of his associates, and any system of rules which denies to him such power, rights, and responsibility is, to that extent, a subversion of the intent of the Constitution and in like manner a denial to the people he represents of an equal voice in the conduct of the Government. That this House, under Republican control, had ceased to be a real representative body and had become a mere machine, dominated and controlled by a one-man power, alike unresponsive to the will of the people and unmindful of their demands, is a fact recognized by everyone acquainted with the situation. As a genuine representative body it had degenerated to such a degree as to become the object of ridicule and scorn. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Emboldened by successive renewals of confidence in it by the people, the Republican Party, so long in control, had constructed a system of rules for the House which robbed the individual Member of his representative capacity and lodged it in the personage of the Speaker of the House. The Speaker, through the authority thus conferred upon him to appoint all committees of the House, both of the majority and the minority parties, an authority carrying with it the power to reward his friends and punish his enemies, had become a figure all powerful, all dominating, all influential. It is a notorious fact that no proposition, however meritorious, could get before this House for consideration upon its merits except at his pleasure. The simplest resolution, involving the most minor proposition, had first to impress the Speaker favorably before that individual would permit a consideration of it by the representatives of the people.

The Speaker of the House, under its rules, had become the absolute dictator of the policy of the House. His will was law. Those who had received favors at his hands in the way of committee assignments, who had been placed in positions of prominence and influence, dared not pursue a course with reference to legislation contrary to the opinion and wish of the individual upon whose continued good will and favor their prominence in the future depended. Every act of this House during very recent years bears the unmistakable impress of the will of the Speaker. Through the influence which he exercised over the committees of his own naming, he had the power to pigeonhole legislation, to prevent consideration of it, and to thwart the will of the people. In a government of the people whose will must find expression through their representatives, if their will is to find expression at all, a system of rules which curtails the rights of the individual representatives and lodges them in any one individual is indefensible. It is a power too great to be placed in the hands of a weak man and too dangerous to be given over to a strong man. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The weak man can not use it in the interest of the people, while the strong man may use it to their hurt. I am more afraid of it in the hands of a strong man, for the tyrants of the world have been its strong men. This system, with its abuses and its dangers, has become known in the popular mind as "Cannonism," and upon the system, not the man, the Democratic Party in the last campaign and for years waged an unrelenting warfare, pointing out to the people the necessity for the restoration of the House to its real representative character. The people, quick to see and quick to resent any encroachment upon or curtailment of their rights in the administration of their own affairs, by the overwhelming defeat of the Republican Party, commissioned us, among other things, to bring about such reforms in the rules of the House as would permit their chosen Representatives to exercise their individual judgments upon all matters, without the hope of reward or the fear of punishment at the hands of any one man. To do this it was necessary to take from the Speaker the authority to appoint committees. This we have done by delegating to a committee elected by the membership of the House the authority to recommend for the final action of that body the membership of its various committees. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

We have made the committees responsive and responsible to the House and not to the Speaker. We have put every Representative of every congressional district in the United States, as is proper, upon a plane of absolute equality with every other Member; we have made it possible for the legislative will of every congressional district to find expression on the floor of the House; we have made the Speaker the presiding officer and not the master of the House, and it is no longer necessary to court his favor or cringe at his knee to get consideration of propositions in which your people are interested. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We have lifted the House from the low state into which it had fallen as a representative body to the high plane of a real representative body as was intended by the Constitution. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

United States Senators are elected by the State legislatures. They are representatives, and it was so designed by the framers of the Constitution, of the States rather than of the people. The Senate was intended to be, as it is often designated, "the greatest deliberative body on earth," comprising in its membership the seasoned, experienced statesmanship and wisdom of the country. It was to be a check upon the sometimes too hasty actions of the less deliberative House; it was, as Washington said, "the saucer into which the hot coffee was to be poured to cool it," and, to guard it against the influences of the people, who sometimes act upon impulse rather than reason, was deliberately set apart from them and made responsible for its conduct to the States alone.

Those patriarchs of old, in giving us a Republic, launched an experiment—an experiment in the ability of the people for self-government. The experiment had never been tried before, the sea was uncharted, and wisely they, in this as in their every act, decided that complete self-government might become an instrument of danger in the hands of a people inexperienced in that art; hence, they constituted the Senate as an anchor of safety against the storms of popular passion and the designs of self-seeking and overambitious agitators. They were not confident of the fate of their experiment, nor was their faith in the capacity of the people for self-government complete.

But more than a century of experience in self-government has vanished all doubts as to the success of the experiment, and if this is in reality to be a Government of the people, for the people, by the people it follows that membership in both branches of the Federal Congress must be directly responsible to the people. The Democratic Party, believing that all authority originates in the people and that no authority is greater than the people, has for years favored the election of United States Senators by a direct vote. We believe that Senators, like Representatives, should owe their power to the people and be responsible to them for the reward for faithful or the punishment for unfaithful service. We have passed the bill and sent it to the Senate for its consideration providing for the election of United States Senators by a direct vote of the people, as we promised to do in our campaign pledges and platform declarations, and we have done this by the unanimous vote of our party. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

We have passed the bill known as the corrupt practice act, which seeks to purify elections and prevent the use of money for the debauchery of our citizenship—a practice which has become a stigma upon the honor of our country. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

During the last session of the Sixty-first Congress the Republican President of the United States sent to Congress a message conveying the information that a trade agreement had been entered into between this and the Canadian Government. The practical effect of this reciprocal pact was to lower the tariff barrier between the two countries, promoting at the same time a more friendly relationship between them. There is no more reason for a tax upon the products of the mine, field, and factory of Canada, entering into the United States than there is for a tax upon the products of North Carolina which enter the State of South Carolina. There should be no tariff wall dividing the North American Continent; certainly there should be no such dividing line between this country and Canada, whose people are similar in every respect.

The so-called reciprocity treaty is a long step in the right direction. The President requested of the Congress, both branches of which at that time was in complete control of his own party, to enact the necessary legislation to vitalize the agreement into law. A Republican House passed the bill, but only through the almost unanimous support of the then Democratic minority. A Republican Senate refused even to consider it. To this circumstance we are indebted for the present session of this Congress, and I am sure every Democrat must feel a sense of obligation to the circumstance which gives to a Democratic House its first opportunity to begin upon the enormous task of relieving the people of the heavy burdens which 16 years of Republican maladministration have laid upon them. As promptly as possible and with no effort to play politics we have passed the legislation in this House and sent it to its fate in a Republican Senate. [Applause on the Democratic side.] How it will fare there it is not for me to predict, but the country will understand that the Democratic majority of this House—and it is to this majority that the people look for Democratic inspiration and leadership—has fulfilled its obligation and discharged its responsibility.

Mr. Chairman, let it be borne in mind, let the country not forget, that these substantial reforms—this important work—have been accomplished without the necessity of the application of the "gag rules," so well known and relied upon under the old régime, when Cannonism was in control. No effort to prevent or limit debate has been made, the fullest freedom of discussion has been had, and the right to amend at all times has not been denied to any Member desiring to exercise it. This in itself is a reform, the significance and far-reaching importance of which time in its fullness only can show, but it means that the rights of the individual Member of this House have been restored to him.

And now, Mr. Chairman, we are about to take the next step in the Democratic program. The bill under consideration is the first movement in the direction of a real revision of the tariff in the interest of all the people of the country. It marks the beginning of a chain of events about to take place of momentous importance to the future of this Nation. It is the first shot directed against the citadel of protection, the first effort to unloose the grip of greed from the throat of the American consumer. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It initiates an economic revolution. The Republican theory of protection is to be supplanted by the Democratic theory of a tariff for revenue. The warfare between these theories has been long and bitter. For 16 years the Republican idea has been triumphant. As the fruitage of this system trusts, combines, and monopolies have multiplied and grown strong almost beyond the power of the Government to control. The cost of living has increased enormously, while wages have failed to increase correspondingly. The few have fattened upon the toil of the many, and as a nation we have nearly substituted for the moral the material standard of living. We have learned to measure greatness and goodness by the yardstick of the dollar. We are rapidly beginning to follow the Morgan rather than the Jefferson ideal; to give ear to the voice of Mammon rather than to the oracle of justice and equality to all men, all classes, all sections. This tendency is inevitable; it is inherent in the system; it is a deep-seated cancer, insidiously, but surely, gnawing at the vitals of our Nation. The danger is too imminent to permit compromise with it; the people have directed its destruction root and branch. We are going to do it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The bill under consideration is a measure designed to give relief from the burdens of high protection to a large class of our people, and that, too, without regard to sectional lines. The Democratic Party has never stood for free trade. Historically and logically a large free list is un-Democratic. I quote from the Walker report, upon which was constructed the Democratic tariff act of 1846, ever afterwards recognized by Democrats as the ideal method of adjusting tariff rates for the true Democratic principles regarding the tariff:

First. That no more money should be collected than is necessary for the wants of the Government, economically administered.

Second. That no duty be imposed on any article above the lowest rate which will yield the largest amount of revenue.

Third. That below such rates discrimination may be made, descending in the scale of duties; or, for imperative reasons, the article may be placed in the list of those free from all duty.

Fourth. That the maximum revenue duty should be imposed on luxuries.

Fifth. That all minimums and all specific duties should be abolished and ad valorem duties substituted in their place, care being taken to guard against fraudulent invoices and undervaluation, and to assess the duty upon the actual market value.

Sixth. That the duty should be so imposed as to operate as equally as possible throughout the Union, discriminating neither for nor against any class or section.

This bill is constructed in accordance with the principles just cited. It is not a step in the direction of free trade. There is a good Democratic reason for the inclusion in this free list of every article contained therein, either because of "imperative reasons" or "that the duty should be so imposed as to operate as equally as possible throughout the Union, discriminating neither for nor against any class or section." This free list seeks not only for "imperative reasons" to relieve the tariff-tax payers of the country of some of their burdens, but at the same time carries into effect the righteous principle that these burdens shall discriminate "neither for nor against any class or section." It not only lightens the burdens of tariff taxation, but equalizes them. As the distinguished chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, whose leadership of the majority in this session has been signally brilliant and successful, said in answer to a question on April 21 of this year, speaking of this bill:

I will say to the gentleman that the bill puts on the free list agricultural implements, fencing wire, and salt and free lumber for your northern farmers. It puts on the free list free cotton bagging and free ties for the southern farmer. It puts on the free list free meat, free bread, and free salt for the people who live in the cities and who are crying for cheaper food products to reduce the cost of living.

Every section of the country is given fair treatment by this bill and the doctrine so tersely laid down by Chairman UNDERWOOD, as above quoted, is the old-fashioned Democracy to which every good Democrat may swear fealty. If I may be permitted, the same doctrine almost in identical language, was announced by me in a speech in the capital of my State on August the 20th of last year, in this language:

If the Democrats had controlled the House, and we had been called upon to frame a tariff bill, constructed along the idea of reduced expenditures and increased revenues from an income tax as a part of our plan of revenue taxation, it would have been possible to put lumber on the free list and yet work no discrimination against the taxpayers of the South. A Democratic bill would have so rearranged rates and schedules that they would have borne equitably and justly upon all sections, persons, and industries, as is repeatedly demanded in various Democratic platforms. The Payne-Aldrich tariff bill, in its unjust discrimination against the South, gives the western farmer his binding twine free of duty, but puts a tax of a million dollars annually upon the bagging and ties of the people whom in part I represent. A Democratic bill would have given the western farmer free binding twine, the southern farmer free bagging and ties, and the lumber consumer along the Canadian border line free lumber; and here is a practical illustration of how these duties may be equalized under a Democratic system, with equal advantage to every and special hurt to no section.

Existing rates on many of the articles carried in this free list are revenue producing and therefore Democratic, but I support this bill notwithstanding that fact, because it in effect equalizes, without regard to class or section, the burdens of tariff taxation. It gives to the great producing class of this Nation upon whom depends its prosperity—the farmer—the implements of his profession free of taxation and opens up to competition his market for their purchase. The duties upon agricultural implements—and these duties measure the benefit to the Treasury of the United States—amount to a little more that $12,000 annually. The revenue is practically nothing, because the rate of duty evidently is sufficiently high to prevent importations. The fact is that our manufacturers of agricultural implements of all descriptions have become able, under high protective duties, not only to control the domestic market, but to sell their products in foreign markets at prices lower than they sell them to the domestic purchaser. Every section of the country—North, East, South, and West—is to the extent of its agricultural population an equal beneficiary under the terms of this bill.

The bill puts upon the free list cotton bagging and cotton ties. Already the binding twine of the western farmer is on the free list, and there can be no reason that the cotton producer, the fruits of whose labor make the balance in favor of the United States in her international trade relationship, whose toil gives to the world its chief clothing material, and who, though of the South, should not be entitled to fair and equal treatment with all other sections of the country, as is provided in this bill, which gives him the baling material for his crop free of taxation, saving him an annual burden of $1,000,000.

Leather, boots and shoes, harness, and saddlery are put upon the free list. There is imperative necessity for this. Hides are already on the free list, and, in addition to this fact, free boots and shoes will inure to the benefit of all classes of people in all sections of the country—the farmer, the hod carrier, the blacksmith, the clerk, all classes, are equally to share in the saving of nearly $100,000 annually which they now pay upon these articles.

The duties on barbed and other fence wire, wire rods, strands, ropes, and so forth, amount to $514,000 a year as the tax which the consumers of these artices contribute to the support of the Government. All of these are placed upon the free list, which will mean a saving in taxation of more than half a million dollars to those who use fence wire and similar articles. Here, again, every section of the country, in proportion to its consumption of these articles, is the equal beneficiary of this proposed legislation. No one section is singled out; every section is included.

The ad valorem rate of duty upon fresh and preserved meats is 21.71 per cent, while the duty derived upon importations of fresh and preserved meats amounts to about $160,000 annually. The rate upon flour, cereals, and bread is 23.96 per cent, and the duties collected for 1910 are $273,746. Both classes of these food products, essential necessities of life in every family, rich or poor, North or South, East or West, are put upon the free list. Democratic justness again.

Sewing machines, the necessity for which exists in every home in the country, are put upon the free list. Our manufacturers of sewing machines have for years sold them in foreign markets cheaper than in the domestic markets, and there can be no just reason, either from a Republican or Democratic viewpoint, for the continuance of a tariff tax upon them.

Salt is a prime necessity of life. Every family uses it. It has never been regarded by the Democratic Party in its history as a proper subject for tariff taxation. The father of the Democratic Party, Mr. Jefferson, recommended the "suppression of the duties on salt," and Mr. Walker, in his report, says, "Salt is a necessary of life, and should be as free from tax as air or water." This bill puts salt on the free list in accordance with the Democratic theory and practice, although the Payne-Aldrich Act carried an ad valorem rate of 50.96 per cent upon it.

Lumber, laths, and shingles are put upon the free list, although the ad valorem rate on these articles is only 8.57 per cent, while the revenue to the Treasury from these duties is $1,918,803 annually. Certainly the rate of duty is not prohibitive, for the revenue produced is considerable. The nonsectional character of this bill is shown perhaps most unmistakably by the fact that the territory to be benefited by the removal of the duty on lumber, laths, and shingles is limited to a very narrow strip along the Canadian border line. It is easy to prove that the great body of consumers of lumber throughout the country can not and will not, under the laws of trade, benefit by the removal of this tax. Certainly the people of my section, those who buy lumber, will not feel the results of it, and yet in that spirit of fairness to all sections, according to the Democratic idea in the fixing of tariff rates, we propose in this bill to help the consumers of lumber along the Canadian border line to the extent of the remittal to them of the tax which they now contribute, through the duties on lumber, to the Federal Treasury.

Briefly summarized, the effect of this bill will make agricultural implements free of tariff taxation to the farmers of every section; cotton bagging and cotton ties free of tariff taxation to the southern farmers; sacks, burlaps, gunny cloth, and materials used in the making of bags and sacks for fertilizers and farm products free of tariff taxation to all the farmers; leather, boots and shoes, harness, saddles, and saddlery free of tariff taxation to every section of the country; barbed and other fence wire, wire rods, strands, ropes, and so forth, free of tariff taxation to all consumers; fresh and preserved meats, flour, cereals, and bread free of taxation to every American home; sewing machines free of taxation to all; salt free of taxation to every household; and lumber, laths, and shingles free of taxation to those living along the Canadian border line.

The revision thus far attempted is in literal accordance with Secretary Walker's sixth principle for the levying of tariff taxes, "that the duty should be so imposed as to operate as equally as possible throughout the Union, discriminating neither for nor against any class or section." There is not a fair-minded man in the House who can successfully controvert this fact, and it is surprising to hear the criticism that this bill is sectional in its character—a criticism unjust and without foundation. No section, class of people, nor industry is discriminated against, nor is there any discrimination in favor of any section, class of people, or industry. Equal and exact justice is meted out to all alike.

The bill comes to the House with the unanimous support of the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee, and will receive the unanimous support of every Democrat of the House. Whatever opposition develops will come from those who are wedded to the god of protection and who, consciously or unconsciously, have served the trusts so long they have forgotten how to serve the people. But over their protests, in the face of their opposition, this House, commissioned by the people to revise the tariff, is going to pass this bill, confident in its fairness and justice to all sections and that it will prove of substantial benefit to the people.

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, as I have already stated, the passage of this bill marks the beginning of a chain of legislative events of vast importance. The tariff system is so interwoven into the warp and woof of the industrial life of the Nation that it is the part of wisdom to go about its revision sanely and conservatively and gradually, but in due time we shall revise other schedules in such manner as to cause the least business confusion, so adjusting them as to equalize taxation to all, and destroying as completely as possible the abuses, discriminations, and iniquities of the present law, whose revision the people demand. [Prolonged applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS]. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, every American citizen who holds his country's welfare above that of mere party advantage must be gratified at the swift progress made by the Representatives of the Democratic Party in this House toward the redemption of the promises made to the people through the party platform. In the short time that has elapsed since the assembling of this extra session we have proven to the people, by the legislation passed, that party platforms are something more than mere platitudes framed to win support at the polls. We have shown that the restoration of the Democratic Party to complete power in all the departments of our Government, legislative and executive, will mean that preelection pledges made to the people will be faithfully and honestly kept. This is in strong contrast with the action of the Republican Party in the extra session of two years ago, when a Republican House and a Republican Senate were called into extraordinary session by a Republican President for the purpose of redeeming a solemn promise to revise the tariff downward, and after a session of six months' duration shamelessly repudiated the solemn pledge made to the people by passing the Payne-Aldrich Tariff Act, which increased rather than decreased the burdens of tariff taxation. This prompt action on the part of a Democratic House at this session is but a manifestation of what a Democratic House will do two years hence in the interest of the people, when fortified and sustained, as it will be, by a Democratic Senate and a Democratic President.

A little house cleaning in governmental affairs now and then is a mighty good thing. This fact was never more clearly demonstrated than at the opening of the present Congress, when the Democrats came into control of the House for the first time in 16 years. It was found that during those years the Republican Party had created at least 98 useless jobs connected with the House organization alone, and that these jobs were filled by political favorites, who did but little, if anything more, than draw their salaries and get in each other's way in the transaction of the business of the House. We had promised the people retrenchment in governmental expenditures.

The pruning knife was promptly applied to all of these useless jobs and the result is that over $182,000 a year, or more than $580 for every working day in the year, has already been saved to the people in the organization of the House alone. And it may be safely predicted, Mr. Chairman, that the same care and scrutiny will be shown when the House comes to make up the appropriations for the various departments of the Government, and that all useless and unnecessary offices will be abolished and the expenses of the Government will be reduced in so far as it can be done without injury to its actual necessities and without denying to every employee the right to a fair and just wage for the services performed. It remains to be seen whether a Republican Senate will join a Democratic House in its effort to restrict and reform the enormous expenditures of our Government. If not, then the people will know whom to hold responsible.

The Democratic Party has always stood for a government which should be in the strictest sense responsive to the will of the people. And when it became apparent that the United States Senate was no longer regardful of the popular will; when it appeared that great legislative reforms were initiated and passed by the House only to be put to sleep in some committee of the Senate, the Democratic Party was first to declare for an amendment to the Constitution providing that Senators should be elected by a direct vote of the people and thus brought in close contact with the people. And this Democratic House has kept that pledge in the letter, and in the spirit, by passing, as its first measure, a bill providing for the submission of such a constitutional amendment. And it is now up to a Republican Senate and a Republican President as to whether the people shall be denied the privilege of incorporating in their organic law the right to choose their Senators at the ballot box, and thus have a Senate as well as a House truly representative of the people and responsive to their will. And it may be interesting as a matter of history to say just here that the only President who ever recommended this reform in a message to Congress was a Democrat and a Tennesseean.

Andrew Johnson when a Member of this House introduced two resolutions providing for the submission of such an amendment. Later on, in 1860, while serving as a Senator from Tennessee, he introduced a similar amendment. And afterwards, when he became President, in 1868, he urged Congress to submit such an amendment to the people.

The principal question, Mr. Chairman, now agitating the public mind is that of tariff revision. Taxation of all the people for the benefit of a part of the people, or of a particular class, is wrong in theory and in principle. No taxes should be levied which are not for the common benefit of all. A system of tariff taxation which has for its sole object the protection of some industry from foreign competition must, in the nature of things, bear heavily upon that class of citizens who consume the products of such industry. Such a policy is not only un-Democratic, but it is violative of the spirit of fair play and equal opportunity which should obtain in a free and republican form of government. This was the issue upon which the Democratic Party rode into power in the last election. The people have grown tired of a policy of tariff legislation which has had an eye single and alone for the great manufacturing interests, and which has not taken into consideration the interest of the farmer, the wage earner in the mine and in the factory, and the other great consuming classes of our country. The people are opposed to a policy of exclusion which has placed restrictions upon trade and brought about artificial conditions which have destroyed competition in those articles of commerce which are necessary for the life, comfort, and happiness of all the people. The Republican Party, notwithstanding its solemn pledge to revise the tariff downward, and thus give relief from some of the burdens which are now resting upon the consuming classes of the country, failed to afford relief in the extra session of two years ago, and the people have turned to the Democratic Party as the only source from which this relief can be expected.

The pending bill, which undertakes to put agricultural implements, cotton bagging and ties, wire fencing, boots and shoes, fresh and preserved meats, flour, cereals, bread, lumber, sewing machines, salt, and other articles which enter into the use and consumption of the farmer and of the consumer on the free list is the first of the measures proposed by the Democrats as a part of their plan to lower the tariff to a revenue basis. It is in harmony with the Democratic principle that the tariff should be made as low as possible on the prime necessities of life, and as high on the luxuries of life as is consistent with the object of raising the greatest amount of revenue. It comes as a companion bill to the reciprocity bill, which was recommended by the President, and which passed the House a few days ago, and is now pending in the Senate. There are those on the other side of this Chamber, who opposed the reciprocity bill because they said it did an injury to the farmer, in that it took the tariff off of his products and permitted Canada to import such products into this country free of duty. It struck me as passing strange, Mr. Chairman, that those who opposed most strongly that bill, because they claimed it would hurt the farmer, were those who have always stood for high protective duties upon the things which the farmer has to buy, particularly lumber and steel products. [Applause on the Democratic side.] No one, I dare say, ever heard them before lift up their voices in behalf of the farmer. And I have a suspicion that amounts to a certainty, that their solicitude for the farmer, and their opposition to that bill did not arise because it placed farm products from Canada upon the free list, but because it admitted lumber from Canada into this country free and reduced the duty on wire fencing and agricultural implements from Canada, thus furnishing competition with the Lumber Trust, the Steel Trust, and the Farm Implement Trust, thereby insuring cheaper materials to the home builders and the farmers of this country. And I wish to say to these gentlemen that if they really desire to legislate in behalf of the great American farmer, without regard to section or locality, the farmer of the North, the South, the East, and the West, then they should support the pending bill, which admits free of duty from all the world articles used by the farmer, thus bringing about a competition which will reduce the price which the farmer is now compelled to pay for these various articles, so necessary in the cultivation of his farm.

But, Mr. Chairman, I dare say that you will hear nothing from these gentlemen in behalf of the farmer while this bill is pending. They will not support it, for their solicitude for the farmer is not one-half so great as their desire to save harmless the great interests, which the passage of this bill will affect. In recommending the passage of the reciprocity bill, the President has admitted what Democrats have always contended, that is, that the tariff placed upon farm products, such as wheat, corn, barley, oats, etc., was of no advantage or profit to the farmer, and did not serve to increase the value of his products one farthing. Otherwise, the President, who is a protectionist, and believes in the policy of protection as applied to all American industries, is in the position of insisting that a high tariff should be maintained upon the manufactured products for the benefit of the manufacturer, and that the farming classes, numbering 30,000,000 of our population, should be denied equal benefits under our laws. But, Mr. Chairman, the fact that we live in a country of such great agricultural resources, both in fertility of soil and climatic advantages, that we produce more than we need for home consumption and export every year great quantities of wheat, corn, and other products of the farm, proves beyond controversy that the tariff has absolutely nothing to do with the fixing of the price of our farm products. The price is fixed in the market, which takes our great surplus, where it comes into competition with like products from other countries. In the last 10 years we exported and sold abroad $1,975,278,025 worth of breadstuffs made from farm products. We exported and sold abroad during the last 10 years 812,239,651 bushels of wheat, and, in addition thereto, 144,945,543 barrels of flour. During the same years we exported and sold abroad 750,074,873 bushels of corn, and, in addition thereto, 5,402,383 barrels of corn meal. These facts show beyond any controversy that the prices obtained for these products abroad fixes the prices which the farmer obtains at home for their farm products, and that the tariff placed on farm products, and which has been removed in so far as Canada is concerned by the passage of the Canadian reciprocity treaty, has had absolutely nothing to do with the fixing of the prices of farm products.

The tariff on farm products was levied by the Republican Party simply for the purpose of justifying in the minds of the farmers the excessively high duties which are maintained on the articles of manufacture which the farmer has to buy. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It is simply a sham and a fraud on the part of the Republican Party to deceive the farmer and make him believe that he is sharing some of the benefits from the protection accorded to the protected industries of this country; that while, on account of the high tariff on those things which he has to buy, he is forced to pay more to the Implement Trust for his agricultural implements and more to the Woolen Trust for his clothing, and more to the Lumber Trust for his lumber, and more to the Leather Trust for his leather and his harness and saddles, and more for his boots and shoes, and all other necessities of life, he nevertheless reaps some of the benefits of protection through an increased price for his wheat and other products by virtue of the tariff duty which is levied on the imports of such products. But the utter fallacy of such an idea is apparent from the fact that we scarcely import any farm products, and that our exports, which are enormous, come into competition with similar products from other countries in the markets of the world, which fixes the price of our home market. The American farmer sells the product of his energy and toil in an open market, where he comes in competition with every farmer in the world. But when he comes to buy what he needs he is compelled to do so in a restricted and protected market. When he buys his hoe and his ax, which he uses daily; when he buys his plow, his harrow, his cultivator, his drill, and the other implements and tools with which he prepares his land and cultivates his corn, his wheat, his tobacco, and the other products of his farm; when he buys his harness and bridles, which he uses on his stock; when he and the laboring and consuming classes of this country buy boots and shoes for themselves and their families; when he and they buy the clothing which is necessary for their comfort and protection and that of their children, it is necessary for them to contribute 10, 20, 30, and even 40 per cent and more of the value of the articles to the manufacturer, who is protected from outside competition by a tariff tax of that amount. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The amount of such tariff tax is not paid into the Public Treasury, as is shown by the great amount of exports of these commodities. It goes into the pockets of the manufacturer, who has taken advantage of the fact that he is protected from outside competition and has formed combinations at home to annihilate home competition. The laborer and the wage earner in the mine and in the factory, in whom the Republican Party professes to be so much interested and with whom and whose interest it always seeks to conjure in the effort to cover up the real object and purpose of the protection policy to shut out foreign competition and swell the profits of the manufacturer, is also compelled to buy the necessaries of life in a high-protected market. There are no compensatory benefits for him. His wages have not kept pace with the increased cost of living and have not equaled the increase of profits which the manufacturer has enjoyed. The Republican Party believes in protecting his employer from competition with the foreign manufacturer, but it has made no effort during the long years of its complete control of the Government to protect the home laborer and wage earner from the great influx of cheap foreign labor which is coming into this country annually, practically unrestricted. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Oh, consistency, thou are indeed a jewel! For whose benefit, Mr. Chairman, has this policy of shutting out foreign competition in the necessaries of life been engrafted on our statute books? The question answers itself. It is for the benefit of those great corporations which, under the shadow of the high-tariff wall, have been enabled to combine and monopolize the manufacture and sale of the farmer's tools of trade and those things which constitute the actual necessaries of life. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Take, for instance, the Farming Implement Trust. This great combine supplies the home market, and in 1910 shipped abroad products of its factories amounting to $28,124,033. Nearly one-fourth of its entire output is sold abroad. It is able to compete in the markets of the world with the foreign manufacturer, but is unwilling for the tariff on its products to be removed and to come into competition with them at home. As a result for a number of years it sold its products cheaper abroad than at home.

The result is that the foreign farmer uses American-made implements, purchased at a cheaper price than they are sold to the American farmer, to cultivate his crops, and then sells his products in the same market in competition with the American farmer. Mr. Chairman, there could be no more striking illustration of the unwise, unjust, unequal, and unpatriotic effect of the present high tariff on agricultural implements. If this great International Harvester Trust had been selling to the American as cheap as to our foreign competitors, millions of dollars would have been saved to the American farmer. Harvesting machinery has steadily increased in price to the American farmer, while it has decreased in every other country of the world. In support of this proposition I quote from the minority report of the Select Committee of the United States Senate on Wages and Commodities, filed June 23, 1910:

While everywhere else in the world the price of harvesting machinery has been appreciably reduced since 1900, in the United States it has been materially increased. In fact, the increase really started nearly contemporaneously with the Dingley tariff. In spite of the high protective tariff on this class of machinery and of the fact that machinery of American origin had to pay, until recently, a much higher duty in France than did machinery of German, Belgian, Austrian, or English origin, this combine sold its machines in open competition and at a lower cost than any other like machinery was sold in France. The fact is, they were satisfied with a comparatively small profit on their European sales as long as they had a free hand and could charge the American farmer any exorbitant price they deemed expedient. Not only this, but they made the terms and conditions of sale very burdensome to the American purchasers. It was shown before the committee that harvesters were bought before the trust was formed at $86 and that they advanced the price to $125, an advance of over 45 per cent. So binders have advanced from $100, the already high price of 1900, to $130 in 1910. Of course they were safe behind a tariff wall of 20 per cent ad valorem and high freight rates from abroad, together with the almost insurmountable difficulty of getting repairs when needed.

I also read from the majority report of that committee, which was prepared by Senator LODGE, whom everyone will admit is good Republican authority, and presented to the United States Senate on June 23, 1910. I dare say no gentleman on the other side of the Chamber will assert that he is not a good Republican authority. He says, speaking of the International Harvester Trust:

While industrial combinations may result in economies of production and distribution, the fact that competition is either wholly or partly removed leads to abuses. Thus, according to witnesses who testified before the committee, the International Harvester Co. has not only unreasonably advanced the price of self-binders, but have changed the method of sale in such a way as to result in many cases in a loss to farmers. Before the organization of the International Harvester Co. the local dealer selling the binder sent a mechanic to "set up" the machine and to remain a few hours until the machine was running smoothly, and in case repairs were needed they were supplied immediately from the stock of the local dealer. Since the organization of the International Harvester Co. the machine when purchased by the farmer is sent "knocked down" to his nearest railroad station, and the farmer must set up his machine, and in case repairs are needed the machine is idle until the repairs are forwarded by express from the branch house, usually located in some large city and not necessarily convenient to the grain section.

In this connection, Mr. Chairman, I ask permission to insert some tables set forth in the majority report referred to, which show how rapidly the price of farming implements has been advanced to the American farmer in the last 10 years in every section of the country.

These tables speak for themselves. They show how persistently the manufacturer has advanced each year the price on all the implements and machinery used by the American farmer. We read much, Mr. Chairman, of the increased price and value of farm products, but we hear little of the manner in which the farmer is robbed of the fruits of his toil and the benefits of the increase by the action of this great combination in increasing the price of what he has to buy. [Applause on the Democratic side.] There are two remedies for this situation, and both should be applied. These unholy combinations in restraint of trade and for the stifling of competition should be prosecuted in the courts and broken up, and, if necessary, to make the job complete and effective, those responsible for them should be put in jail. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The other remedy is to let the tariff bars down so that we may have full and free competition by the foreign manufacturer with the home manufacturer, just as is done in Europe, where the farmer reaps the benefits of the competition. This is exactly what the pending bill proposes to do, and in the interest of our farming population, numbering over 30,000,000 people, nearly one-third of our entire population, it ought to be enacted into law.

As long as our country shall remain so fertile and fruitful as it is to-day the American farmer can receive no benefits from a protective tariff on his products. He wants none. He asks none. All he wants is a square deal and a fair and equal opportunity. He only asks, and he has the right to demand, that this Congress shall pass this bill, which will at least put him on an even footing with his foreign competitors and will deprive the manufacturers of the tools which he uses the privilege of placing an arbitrary and exorbitant price upon them for the purpose of enriching themselves at his expense.

Mr. Chairman, I was surprised the other day to hear my distinguished friend Mr. MOORE, who so ably represents the city of Philadelphia upon this floor, in the course of a very able and interesting argument in opposition to this bill, and while engaged in a short colloquy with my colleague from Tennessee, say that he regretted that the boys who live in my colleague's district could not enter the factory where they might earn $3 per day. That was an amazing statement, coming as it did from a representative of a great city. One of the greatest problems of to-day is the congestion of the population of our large cities. Young men are leaving the farms of their fathers and are crowding into the cities, where they earn less and enjoy the pleasures of life less. This presents a serious question, to which statesmen and economists are directing their attention. One solution of the problem is to pass legislation which will give to the farmer an equal opportunity in the battle of life. The trouble lies, to a large extent, in the fact that the party to which the gentleman holds allegiance has enacted legislation solely with reference to the interest of those from whom the farmer has to buy and with no regard to the interest of the farming and consuming classes of this country. By such legislation great fortunes have been built up for the few at the expense of the many. The farmer grows his wheat, his corn, his tobacco, and his other products only to see the real fruits of his labor enjoyed by the speculators. If the value of his product increases, he finds that the value of those things which he has to buy in order to produce his crops and to clothe and sustain his family have increased in greater proportion. This condition is a most severe indictment against the policy and conduct of the Republican Party, for it is in large part due to the legislation enacted in a government to which the farmer is the hope of the future, as he has been its chief reliance in the past. The gentleman, with just pride, commented on the growth of the population of his city and its great corporate wealth. He spoke of the smokestacks of its factories and of the wage earners who are given employment therein.

But he must not forget that these things would not have been possible had it not been for the farmer who feeds the inhabitants of his great city. He should not forget that if it was not for the farmer in Tennessee and the other great agricultural States of this Union his city and the other great cities of this country would be depopulated. Let the farmer's boy take his advice and leave the farm for the factory and it will be necessary to shut the doors of the shops and close down the factories of which he boasted. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And I wish to urge the gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber, who have had a majority in this House for so long and have passed no legislation for the relief of the farmer, to give their support to this bill, which seeks to give to the farmer his tools untaxed and unmonopolized.

But, Mr. Chairman, while this bill has been called the farmers' free-list bill, its passage will be of benefit to the wage earner and the consumer in the city. It places fresh and preserved meats, flour, cereals, and bread upon the free list. It places leather and its products, made from cattle hides and cattle skins, also harness and saddles and boots and shoes, on the free list. The tariff now levied on these articles is a tax which the consumer must pay. As in the case of agricultural implements, the importations of this class of products are insignificant, and this tariff tax goes into the pockets of the manufacturer instead of into the United States Treasury. Two years ago hides were placed on the free list by the Payne-Aldrich Tariff Act in order that the New England manufacturers might obtain raw material from Argentina and other South American countries at the lowest possible cost. I recall that the hearings before the Republican Ways and Means Committee disclosed that some of the leading manufacturers argued that if they were permitted to bring their hides into this country free of duty no duty would be required on boots and shoes, because with cheap raw material the manufacturer would be able to compete with the world.

There can be no doubt about his ability to do so, for last year boots and shoes to the value of $13,216,000 were shipped abroad to foreign countries, where they came into competition with those of foreign make. Why, then, should a tariff be maintained on boots and shoes, or upon leather goods, when $51,123,000 worth of the latter was exported last year? If the American manufacturer can pay cost of transportation abroad and compete with the foreign manufacturer in foreign markets, why can he not compete with the foreign manufacturer in our home markets? [Applause on the Democratic side.] Why maintain a tariff duty upon boots and shoes and leather goods which simply enables the home manufacturer to exact an exorbitant price from the home consumer? Two years ago the Democrats proposed to place boots and shoes on the free list, but the proposition was defeated by the Republicans who framed and passed the Payne-Aldrich Tariff Act. Cheaper hides did not mean, therefore, cheaper leather goods and boots and shoes, but it meant greater profits for the manufacturer. He derives a double profit by this legislation, for he gets his raw material cheaper and a tariff on his products enables him to keep up the price of boots and shoes to those who wear them. He is enabled to manufacture his boots and shoes cheaper, but the consumer, for whom we ought to legislate, derives no benefit therefrom. Let us pass the pending bill and remove the duty on harness and saddles and boots and shoes, so that the masses of the country may reap the benefit of the cheaper cost of production rather than the manufacturer. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The pending bill permits lumber to come into this country from Canada and other countries free of duty. This is in accord with the Democratic platform of 1908, which declared for free lumber in the interest of the home-building citizens of our country. There is no greater necessity. The timber of this country has been gradually cornered until it is now largely in the hands of great corporations, which largely control its price, protected as they are from possible competition from abroad on account of excessive tariff rates.

This product of our forests ought to be as cheap as it is possible to make it, for it affects every home-building citizen alike. We should, in so far as we can do so by legislation, give the fullest opportunity to every citizen who has the laudable desire to build and live in his own home. There should be no tax upon the material out of which the homes of this Nation are builded, for it is the home which guarantees the permanency of our free institutions. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, I am not one of those who believe in an extensive free list. As a general proposition, I believe that every commodity which is imported should bear its just proportion of the burdens of government. But, sir, there are exceptions which should be made, and I believe that this bill should pass. I understand it to be sound Democratic doctrine to place upon the free list articles which enter into competition with trust-controlled products and those necessaries of life which the American manufacturer sells abroad more cheaply than he does at home. The Democratic Party in its national platform of 1908 declared:

> Articles entering into competition with trust-controlled products should be placed upon the free list; material reduction should be made in the tariff upon the necessaries of life, especially upon articles competing with such American manufactures as are sold abroad more cheaply than at home.

I favor this bill because it embodies these principles. I favor it because I believe that its enactment will redound to the best interest and to the material welfare of the farmer and the consuming classes of this country. [Loud applause.]

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH].

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I am not a free trader, but a protectionist of the school and faith of Abraham Lincoln, who said:

"I don't know much about the tariff, but I know this much: When we buy manufactured goods abroad, we get the goods and the foreigners get the money. When we buy the manufactured goods at home, we get both the goods and the money."

There are two kinds of tariff in the United States:

1. A free-trade tariff.
2. A protective tariff.

A free-trade tariff, or tariff for revenue only, has been and is the policy of the Democratic Party.

A protective tariff has been, is now, and I hope ever will be the cardinal principle and policy of the Republican Party.

We are a busy people, and I want to remind you, lest we forget, that beginning with 1783, under the Confederacy, we have had five free-trade periods in this country, and every one of them has been disastrous.

At the close of one of these periods Mr. Benton—Democratic Senator from Missouri for 30 years—narrated conditions as follows:

"No price for property, no sales except those of the sheriff and the marshal, no purchasers at execution sales except the creditor or some hoarder of money, no employment for industry, no demand for labor, no sale for the products of the farm, no sound of the hammer except that of the auctioneer knocking down property. Distress was the universal cry of the people; relief, the universal demand, was thundered at the doors of all legislatures, State and Federal."

What do you think of a party that so conducts the affairs of the Nation that they must appeal for Federal and State aid to keep the laboring and other classes of people from starving?

During this same time we have had five protection periods, each of which brought prosperity, happiness, and contentment to all our people. At the close of one of these periods and in his last message to Congress, December, 1892, after the country had enjoyed a period of its greatest prosperity, and in an unguarded moment had turned both branches of Congress and the Executive over to Democracy, President Harrison said: "Another indication of the general prosperity of the country is found in the fact that the number of depositors in savings banks increased from 693,870 in 1860 to 4,258,893 in 1890, an increase of 513 per cent, and the amount of deposits from $149,277,504 in 1860 to $1,524,844,506 in 1890, an increase of 921 per cent. In 1891 the amount of deposits in savings banks was $1,623,079,749. It is estimated that 90 per cent of these deposits represent the savings of wage earners. The bank clearances for nine months ending September 30, 1891, amounted to $41,049,390,808. For the same months in 1892, they amounted to $45,189,601,947, an excess for the nine months of $4,140,211,139.

"There never has been a time in our history when work was so abundant or when wages were so high, whether measured by the currency in which they are paid or by their own power to supply the necessaries and comforts of life. It is true that the market prices of cotton and wheat have been low. It is one of the unfavorable incidents of agriculture that the farmer can not produce upon orders. He must sow and reap in ignorance of the aggregate production of the year, and is peculiarly subject to the depreciation which follows overproduction. But, while the fact I have stated is true as to the crops mentioned, the general average of prices has been so much as to give to agriculture a fair participation in the general prosperity."

What Senator Benton said about conditions at the close of one free-trade period could be multiplied many times by leading Democrats and others as to every free-trade period so far in this country, and what President Harrison said respecting conditions at the close of one protective period could be duplicated many times as to each of the five protective periods from the eloquent and forceful statements, not alone of prominent Republicans, but as well of Democrats who have held a foremost place in the councils of their party.

Some one has said: "Protection means prosperity; free trade means adversity." And no people know the truthfulness of this statement better, from practical experience, than do the people of this country.

"For whom the Lord loveth, He chasteneth." So it is that the country is again inflicted with a Democratic House of Representatives. We like you personally. Our criticism is against the things for which you stand.

Here you are again at the first opportunity with another free-trade bill, pure and simple (H. R. 4413), popularly known as the "farmers' free-list bill." You say the country is sick and needs relief after several years of Republican rule; but you offer the same remedy that your fathers and forefathers gave the country which, without a single exception, brought sorrow, sadness, and ruin. And now you want the people to believe that the result this time will be different than it has ever been before. As time goes on, it will be more and more apparent that this bill received but little consideration at the hands of the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee, and less at the hands of the Republican members, for they had no opportunity.

I state, without fear of contradiction, that in the first instance the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee claimed the loss of revenue by this bill would be about $1,500,000, and now they frankly admit that the loss of revenue will be more than $10,000,000. This statement, standing alone, ought to convince everyone that the bill was poorly considered before it was presented to the House.

Again I inquire, Was the Tariff Board consulted in the preparation of this bill? If not, why not? And, if so, where can the data be found that was furnished by the Tariff Board to the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee in the preparation of this bill?

It is well understood that this bill is offered as a "sop" to the farmers, but do not deceive yourselves. They read and think, and have not and will not forget that you refused to amend the reciprocity bill wherein relief might have been given to them. You seemed to think and acted in the passage of the reciprocity bill as though you were legislating for Canadians instead of Americans. You were not willing to give the American farmer just one lone chance to see what the Canadian Parliament would do with the amendments which were offered in the interest not alone of the farmers, but of all our people.

Your plea now is that this bill will grant the relief asked for in the reciprocity bill, well knowing that you do not hope or expect that it will pass the Senate.

The question is being asked on every hand, Why are not rice, peanuts, and other products of the South included in this free-list bill?

At the close of the third free-trade period in this Government, extending from 1833 to 1842, "a farmer in Illinois wrote a letter to his friend in the East, in 1842, complaining that he could get only $0.31 per bushel for his wheat, $0.25 for beans, $0.10 for corn, $0.01½ per pound for beef and pork, and $0.02½ per pound for tobacco, and so forth."

And in Colton's Life of Henry Clay you can find some further interesting facts as to the effect of free trade on the prices of farm products, viz:

"During the free-trade period of 1833–1842 the country witnessed one of the most appalling and disastrous financial revulsions ever known. Manufacturers suspended operations and all kinds of business was at a standstill. Property of every description was parted with at prices that were astounding, and as for currency, there was scarcely any at all. In some parts of Pennsylvania the people were obliged to divide bank notes into halves, quarters, eighths, and so on, and agree to use these fractions as money.

"In Ohio, with all her abundance, it was hard to get money to pay taxes. The sheriff of Muskingum County, as stated by the Guernsey Times in the summer of 1842, sold at auction:

"One 4-horse wagon, at $5.50.
"Ten hogs, at $0.06¼ each.
"Two horses (said to be worth $50 to $75 each), at $2 each.
"Two cows, at $1 each.
"One barrel of sugar, for $1.50.
"And a store full of goods at the same rate.

"In Pike County, Mo., as stated in the Hannibal Journal, the sheriff sold:

"Three horses, at $1.50 each.
"One large ox, for $0.12½.
"Five cows, 2 steers, and 1 calf, the entire lot for $3.25.
"Twenty sheep, for $0.13¾ each.
"Twenty-four hogs, for $0.25 for the lot.
"One eight-day clock, for $2.50.
"One lot of tobacco (7 or 8 hogsheads), for $5.
"Three stacks of hay, at $0.25 each.
"One stack of fodder, at $0.25."

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question——

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I thought I would not improve this speech by permitting anybody to get into it except myself.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I simply want to ask the gentleman what is the date of that?

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I have not the date here, but I can supply the gentleman with it.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I wish the gentleman would. Probably the same source from which the gentleman got that information can supply most any data for a campaign speech.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. It is Colton's life of Henry Clay; one of the most reliable and best sources of information. If the gentleman wishes to dispute that, it is his privilege, of course.

Does not this remind you of another period worse than free trade, if possible, in this country? I refer to the years from 1893 to 1897, under the Wilson-Gorman bill, when the only Democratic President that the country had had since the days of Buchanan—Mr. Cleveland—in a letter addressed to Chairman Wilson, July 2, 1894, when the bill was suspended in the Senate and its state uncertain, declared it a piece of party "perfidy" and party "dishonor."

This period was so recent in our country's history that I will not longer dwell upon it at this time, except to say that I think the Democratic Party are to be congratulated that in the 60 years from 1836 until 1896 they so improved their free-trade legislation that sheep advanced from 13½ cents each to be a drug on the market at 50 cents each in 1896.

I can not conclude these brief remarks without calling attention to the fact that in 1861, after 15 years of free trade or tariff for revenue only, the Government had to borrow money for current expenses, and paid for the same 10 and 12 per cent interest. Compare this, if you please, with conditions in 1891 after 30 years of protection, when the Government could borrow all the money it wanted at 2 per cent.

Now that our Democratic friends are bent upon free-trade legislation, as indicated by the bill under consideration, I want to call to your attention what James Buchanan, a Democratic President, said in his annual message at the close of that fourth distressful free-trade period: "With unsurpassed plenty in all the productions and all the elements of natural wealth our manufacturers have suspended, our public works are retarded, our private enterprises of different kinds are abandoned, and thousands of useful laborers are thrown out of employment and reduced to want. We have possessed all the elements of material wealth in rich abundance, and yet notwithstanding all these advantages our country, in its monetary interests, is in a deplorable condition."

We, who are protectionists and believe that this policy is for the best interests of all our people, like to remind those who do not agree with us of the opinion expressed by an impartial witness, Prince Bismarck: "The success (under protection) of the United States in material development is the most illustrious of modern times. The American Nation has not only successfully borne and suppressed the most gigantic and expensive war of all history, but immediately afterwards disbanded its Army, found work for all its soldiers and marines, paid off most of its debt, given labor and homes to all the unemployed of Europe as fast as they could arrive within its territory, and has done all this by a system of taxation so indirect as not to be perceived, much less felt.

"Because it is my deliberate judgment that the prosperity of America is mainly due to its system of protective law, I urge that Germany has now reached the point where it is necessary to imitate the tariff system of the United States."

My Democratic friends, either in or out of Congress, what would you not give if you were able to quote a distinguished citizen, either of this or any other country, who was able to speak in terms of commendation of any one of the free-trade periods when you have controlled the destinies of this Nation?

WOOL.

I have so many requests for information that I can not refrain from asking our Democratic friends, "What do you propose to do about wool?" I am well aware that many of you would like to put wool on the free list where it was under the Wilson-Gorman bill, but if you do this at this time you fear for the result of the election next year, not only in the legislative but in the executive branch of the Government. I think you owe it to the farmers, wool growers, wool buyers, and manufacturers to state frankly what your position is going to be now and what it will be if you get control of both branches of Congress and the Presidency in 1912.

During the years 1895, 1896, and 1897 more than three-quarters of a billion pounds of wool were imported into this country. Let me quote you a few prices showing the awful destruction of property in the wool and sheep industry after it was known in 1892 that the Democratic Party was to shape the legislation of the country for at least two and, possibly, four years. In 1893, the prices of fine, medium, and coarse wool in the eastern markets were 23, 24, and 21 cents; in 1894, they were 19, 21, and 19 cents; in 1895, they were 18, 21, and 19 cents; in 1896, they were 18, 19, and 18 cents. And to show you what effect the restoration of the Republican Party to power with the assurance of a protective tariff had, I will quote you prices in 1897 at 27, 29, and 25 cents, and in 1898 at 28½, 30, and 24½ cents; and in 1910, they were 33, 36, and 35 cents. I have a letter from a farmer in my district quoting the price of wool now as 18 cents per pound.

If a Democratic House of Representatives is responsible for this reduction as compared with former years since 1896, what would be the effect upon the wool and sheep market if they had full sway in the Government?

And the change was just as marked as to the number and value of sheep under the Wilson-Gorman bill as it was as to the prices for wool. For illustration, in 1893 there were 47,272,553 sheep, valued at $125,909,264; in 1894 there were 45,048,017 sheep, valued at $89,186,110; in 1895 there were 42,294,064 sheep, valued at $66,685,767; in 1896 there were 38,298,783 sheep, valued at $65,167,735—showing a steady decrease in the number of flocks and their value. And to show you what effect the restoration of the Republican Party to power, with the promise of a protective tariff, had, I give you 1897, 36,818,643 sheep, valued at $67,020,942; 1898, 37,656,690 sheep, valued at $92,721,133—clearly showing how soon there began to be an increase in the number as well as in the value—and in 1910 there were 57,216,000, valued at $233,664,000.

You will observe that during the 16 years from 1894 to 1910 there was an annual increase of more than three-quarters of a million in the number of sheep and that during the same time their value almost trebled.

Farmers, which do you prefer—free trade or a protective tariff on wool?

Is it not possible for a Democratic House to so legislate regarding this industry as not to ruin it as they did when last in power?

My countrymen, it is none too soon to begin to think and reflect on what the consequences may be. I ask you to pause upon the threshold of another great presidential campaign and ask yourselves which of the two great parties you want to continue to administer the affairs of this Government. [Applause.]

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON].

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, if I could persuade myself that this much-advertised and loudly proclaimed farmers' free-list bill would really benefit the farmer I should be inclined to vote for it, for I am a friend of the farmer and have good reason for being so. In the first place, I was born on a farm and brought up there to do all the work that the farmer's boy usually does on the farm. I know what it means to wring an unwilling dollar from a begrudging soil. In addition to that, strange as it may sound to some of you, a considerable part of my constituency is made up of farmers. If you do not believe it, come with me to some of our town and county fairs next autumn and I will show you some of the best agricultural products ever produced in this country and some of the finest farmers. These farmers are a most industrious, intelligent, and capable lot of men, and in addition to being successful farmers are capable in many other lines. One of their best products is direct self-government by the people themselves. We hear much these days of direct government by the people, as if it were a new discovery of an ultra-progressive age. As a matter of fact, the people of Connecticut have had direct self-government ever since it was a colony, and to-day a New England town meeting is the purest form of direct self-government by the people anywhere in existence. Right out in the rural towns of Connecticut live the men who have maintained and cherished through the years this form of direct self-government.

I was somewhat surprised and pained the other day, upon taking up the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, to find under one of those "leave-to-print" captions so recently discovered by the combined efforts of our Speaker and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] some remarks credited to Connecticut's junior Representative in this House, my good friend Mr. REILLY, in which he referred somewhat disparagingly to the legislators of our good State as representing white birches instead of men, and to our general assembly as being a "poplar" rather than a "popular" body. I had the honor of serving for four years in the more populous, if not more popular, branch of our general assembly—two years as its speaker—and I wish to state here that a more intelligent, clear-thinking class of men, or men more loyal to their State when assailed, it has never been my privilege to associate or cooperate with. If these men represent white birches—well, all I can say is that even the white birches of Connecticut are well represented. These men and the men they represent know what they want; they know when they want it, and they know how to get it; and yet not one in all my State has written a single word on behalf of this farmers' free-list bill. No; they are not deceived by a name. They look through the pretense and mere empty form of words and see the real danger that lurks behind this widely heralded bill.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, in opening this debate several days ago, referred to this as the beginning of a new era in the revenue policy of this country. If I understand correctly his meaning, it is that as a people we have now turned our backs upon protection and have embarked on a policy of "tariff for revenue only," with free trade as an ultimate goal toward which we are tending.

In view of the proposed adoption of such a program, I trust that the Members of this House will indulge me in a few elementary words on the subject of tariff duties.

As our Constitution is framed, it seems to be clear and generally admitted that a large part of the revenues necessary to run this Government must and was intended to be raised by means of import duties. That being the case, we must levy such duties either upon articles which are competitive or upon articles which are not competitive, or both. There are two theories of laying import duties. One is to lay them upon articles which are not produced in this country and which one may properly call a purely revenue duty. That would be strictly a "tariff for revenue only." The other theory is to lay the duty upon articles the like of which are produced in this country, and by so doing give the manufacturer in this country a certain advantage to offset the disadvantage of higher-priced labor and materials, so that he may compete with the maker of like articles in other countries. As I understand it, it is to be the policy of the Democratic Party hereafter to adopt the first of these policies, so far as they are able to do so, and so far as they adopt the other they are going to call it a "tariff for revenue only."

Now, I believe that the phrase "tariff for revenue only" as applied to competitive articles is misleading; that it is not a fact. We can not have a "tariff for revenue only" on competitive articles, because to the extent of the duty, if it be only 1 cent, the like article with which it comes in competition in this country has the 1-cent advantage, and is therefore protected to the extent of that 1 cent.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Will the gentleman object to a question?

Mr. TILSON. Not at all.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, while that is true, the purpose for which the levy is made is revenue and not protection. As I understand, the difference between our side and yours is that you would levy the tax for the purpose of protection and we would levy it for revenue.

Mr. TILSON. I would levy the tax primarily for the revenue—for revenue we must have in order to exist as a Government—and, incidentally, as a part of the same system I would levy the tax upon articles the like of which we can produce to advantage in this country and thereby encourage the production of that article in this country rather than somewhere else.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. You would levy it for protection, then? That is the only purpose?

Mr. TILSON. No; first, for the revenue——

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I was going to invite you on this side——

Mr. TILSON. And then for protection, because I believe in the conclusion of Lincoln's famous tariff argument, which I have already heard quoted many times on this side of the House and shall not repeat, that it is for the best interests of all the people that just as large a part of the articles consumed in this country as possible should be produced in this country. Therefore, in the collection of the revenue I would so impose the duty as to protect those articles which we can produce to advantage in this country.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. If the gentleman has no objection I would like to ask him a further question. I do not wish to interfere with his speech.

Mr. TILSON. I gladly yield.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Of course, the gentleman believes that a tariff for revenue is beneficial to the country, or else he would not favor it. Now, the question I would like to ask him is this: By what sort of process of reasoning do you account for the fact that in the most highly protected localities there is the largest per cent of poor people—fewer people owning their homes?

Mr. TILSON. I do not accept that as a fact; but if it were true, it would prove nothing here. They might be still poorer if their employment were taken away.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. To be frank, I will ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that in his own State, which is highly protected, about 65 per cent of the people to-day are living in rented homes?

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, that does not necessarily indicate at all the financial condition of a person—whether or not he lives in a rented home. Some of the comfortably wealthy people in my town live in rented property as a matter of choice.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. It may be that I have misconstrued it. It may be that they are all wealthy people and, therefore, 65 per cent of them are living in rented homes.

Mr. TILSON. It does not follow at all that a man is poor because he lives in a rented home. As is well known, thousands of people who would be able to own houses if they wished to do so prefer to rent, so that they may the more readily change their residence to suit their fancy or business without inconvenience or financial loss.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I think that is the exception and not the rule. I think every American citizen, with the possible exception of those in the miserly class, believes in owning his home.

Mr. TILSON. I believe a better criterion is the savings of the comparatively poor in the savings banks of the country; and as to that I am willing to submit a statement of the savings deposited in such institutions in Connecticut for comparison with any other State in the Union.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me to call his attention at that point to the fact that in Great Britain, with but little over half the population that we have in the United States, they have over 900,000 paupers, and for a generation that has been a free-trade country?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Oh, I will not take up the gentleman's time.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I am not a believer in a high protective tariff. I am not a standpatter, if by that opprobrious term you mean a man who refuses to consider the facts and circumstances in connection with each imported article and fix the duty accordingly. As a matter of fact, that is the principal reason why I favor a Tariff Board, in order that we may have the facts and in order that we may ascertain intelligently how to fix upon those articles the duties which will hurt least and help most.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Connecticut yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. TILSON. Very gladly.

Mr. CULLOP. I understood the gentleman to say that he would levy a tariff on articles coming into competition with articles produced here, for instance, and that he would be glad to vote to assist the farmer in this bill if it did assist him. Now, take agricultural implements. For the year 1909 we produced $112,000,000 worth. We exported $25,000,000 worth. There were none imported, and we consumed $87,000,00 worth. Now, if there were no importations, the tariff on such articles as that enabled the producer to charge a higher price to the American consumer than he would otherwise have been able to charge. Now, would it not assist the farmer, putting these on the free list?

Mr. TILSON. I confess I am not able to follow the gentleman in so long and involved a question. At any rate, I prefer not to diverge from the line of my argument here to follow a side issue. I therefore ask the gentleman to pardon me if I do not attempt to go at length into an answer to his question, particularly, inasmuch as I have only 20 minutes' time and have quite a number of other matters to speak of.

Mr. CULLOP. The only point——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. TILSON. I stand on the Republican platform, and believe that the correct measure of the duty to be imposed in each case should represent as nearly as it can be ascertained the difference in the cost of production of that article in foreign countries and here. I recognize the fact that there is great difficulty in ascertaining this difference of cost, but I do not believe it is impossible, and with the help of the intelligent and capable Tariff Board, headed by my friend Prof. Emery, which is already working on this question, I believe that we are in the way of getting at such information as will enable us to fix the duties intelligently on this basis.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Connecticut yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. TILSON. Yes; I yield to my friend from Texas.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The gentleman says he believes the tariff should be measured by the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad, I believe?

Mr. TILSON. I do.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Does he go as far as his party goes in its platform and say that in addition to that there shall be added a "plus" for the manufacturer's profit?

Mr. TILSON. I take a different view of that, Mr. Chairman, from that which my Democratic friends take. If they undertake to make the Republican platform say that we propose to guarantee a profit to the manufacturer, I say "bosh; nonsense!" No stretch of language can make it mean that. If they attempt to make that clause in the platform say that in addition to the cost of production there shall be added a reasonable profit, they make it say nothing, because a legitimate profit is a part of the cost, and is so figured on both sides, and therefore if it means only that it means nothing.

To my mind that phrase in the platform means this: There was a great hue and cry about that time, as there is yet, for that matter, to the effect that the protective tariff enables manufacturers to make an inordinate profit. You will readily recall much that was said. To my mind what that platform says is that the proper measure of a protective duty is the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad, including only a reasonable profit; no more. It means something when thus construed. It means nothing if you misinterpret it the other way.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Connecticut yield?

Mr. TILSON. I yield.

Mr. CULLOP. The gentleman will observe, however, by reading that platform that it reads:

> The duties shall equal the cost of production at home and abroad, together with a reasonable profit.

Mr. TILSON. That is right; that is absolutely correct. And it should be so, because a reasonable profit is a part of the cost, and is figured as such, and the duties should not be any more than that, if that figure can be correctly ascertained.

Now, much has been said, especially on the Democratic side of this House during this debate, in regard to the elections in 1912, as if it were more important that victory should perch upon the Democratic banner in 1912 than that we should enact proper legislation. Even this bill seems to have been drawn with that purpose in view, of helping to gain that victory in 1912. Certainly it was not drawn with any idea of ever being administered at the customhouses of the country, because the difficulties apparent on the face of it are such as to render its proper administration well-nigh impossible. It could easily have been made more specific, but it is dangerous to specify, and it is so much easier and so much safer to indulge in glittering generalities. It is evident that there is a well-laid plan to fool the dear people in 1912; and, recalling the success of a similar plan in the election of 1910, it is not strange that such ardent hopes are being indulged that it will work again.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. DALZELL. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut three minutes more.

Mr. TILSON. But have a care. I am one of those who believe you can not always fool the people and that they will sooner or later learn what is being done for them or to them. I recall the closing words of that old saying of Lincoln, that you can not fool all the people all the time. I am one of those who do not believe that the American people in 1910 commissioned your party to revise the tariff downward to such an extent as to make it, as you call it, a "tariff for revenue only," and if you do it and thereby further disturb business conditions you will, in my opinion, imperil your chances of victory in 1912. For my part I look beyond 1912, or even beyond 1916. I am yet a young man, and I hope to live long in this land which I have tried and am humbly trying now to serve. [Applause.] I have more interest in what is going to be the condition of this country five years from now than I have as to who is going to be President in 1912 or 1916, or who is going to control this House.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. The gentleman means that he has more interest as a Republican in what will happen five years from now?

Mr. TILSON. Not at all. I should like to see my party succeed in 1916 and in every year, because I believe its success means better times and better living conditions for the people of the country at large. My interest is above and beyond all partisan interest. I represent a State that is not only an agricultural State, as I have mentioned, but it is a State filled with manufactures, great and small, filled with all kinds of business, filled with a happy, brave, free, intelligent, independent people, a people that at present are well employed and well paid. They are comparatively happy and prosperous, and I do not wish to see any legislation here that will interfere with that prosperity. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. KENDALL. Did the gentleman say his State is an agricultural State?

Mr. TILSON. Yes; and it is true; but not quite to such an extent as the great agricultural State which my friend from Iowa [Mr. KENDALL] so ably represents on the floor of this House.

It has not been denied that the standard of wages in this country is higher than in most countries with which we compete; nor is it denied that, other things being equal, manufacturing will be done where labor is cheapest. If we put all luxuries on a highly protected list, as we often hear advocated from the other side of this Chamber, and all the necessities of life on the free list, which we are told is the goal of the Democracy, then the tendency will surely be that our necessities will be manufactured by foreigners and only luxuries produced by ourselves. I doubt if anyone would regard that as a fortunate condition. It seems to be assumed that while monopolies may combine to keep up prices within, no combination or monopoly from without will attempt to artificially control prices. But can we be sure of this? Is there any more remorseless combination, trust, or monopoly than the Ocean Carrying Trust? Is it not possible to imagine that the same combination would not only put up freight rates, but would combine with others to manipulate prices of the necessities of life? The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], in a very able speech the other day, gave us an example of how one of the necessities of life not produced in this country is manipulated so as to almost double the price. Have we any assurance that this would not be done if all our necessities had to be secured abroad?

You talk gleefully of large importations as if you gloated over the fact that hereafter our goods would be much more largely manufactured abroad. But what does that mean? It means that just so much less goods will be manufactured here. And what does that mean? Less profits for the manufacturer? Perhaps so; but certainly less wages for the workingman. If his envelope is empty on Saturday night, the market gardener, the farmer, the butcher, the baker, and the candlestick maker will suffer next week, and it will not be made good by the difference in the price of the hoe the farmer buys. You say, Give the farmer cheaper products to use and consume. I say, Have a care that you take not from his best customers their power to purchase his products at any price. You are making a stab in the dark. You will recall that scene in Hamlet where a noise is heard behind the arras. Hamlet stabs, and Polonius is killed. Who will you stab by this proposed legislation? Some Polonius—a rich manufacturer? Perhaps so; and next year he may have to omit his new limousine car, but he will probably have left his open touring car, his runabout, and perhaps an electric victoria for his wife and be able to get through the year with these. But what will the man who rides on the trolley car and wears overalls at the factory or store do? And after all he is the most deserving to be considered, because he makes up much the larger part of our population.

I am not in favor of any tariff duty higher than will represent the difference in cost of production here and abroad, but I will not vote for a bill which, on its face in a number of items, discriminates against the American manufacturer. Give him at least an even chance with his foreign competitor. This bill does not do that. Nor am I willing to vote for a bill that I sincerely believe is but the entering wedge which, when driven home, will shake our industrial structure, reduce or destroy the wages of American workingmen, and imperil the general prosperity which has so long prevailed. I do not believe that your party has been, or will be, commissioned to revise the tariff below a fairly protective basis. If you do it, mark my word, the general prosperity of this country will pay the penalty of your rash action. Already the penumbra of uncertainty and anxious waiting is visible across the face of our American business world, due principally to your tariff agitation. Have a care that you bring not again the total eclipse. Not what is, but what is feared may be, already disturbs business conditions. Capital seeking investment is proverbially timid. Your agitation without cause and your action without knowledge will embarrass it or frighten it into idleness; and the first man to suffer will not be the capitalist, but the workingman, who loses the wages the capital would otherwise pay. Connecticut has an army of such workingmen, representative of millions of men all over this country—brave, intelligent, independent in action. I stand here to speak for them. If your ill-digested legislation brings again to them the conditions of the early nineties, they will understand and act accordingly. Go on with your agitation. Go ahead with your oft-repeated threat that this is but the beginning of what you are going to do in the way of tariff smashing. Once convince the business men of this country that you intend to do what you say and that there is a probability of your having the power to do it, and the partial paralysis in business already felt will become general. The extremities and weaker nerves of the industrial body are already affected perceptibly through fear of what may possibly happen. Have a care that you do not complete the prostration.

The highest and best interests of your constituents and mine—business men, workingmen, farmers, professional men all over the country, from one end of the land to the other—demand that we stop here and now before we pass this bill; and as soon as the Senate has acted upon what we have already done, which is all we were called here to do, let us adjourn and go home. Give business a chance for a little while free from disturbing legislation. Our duty is plain. If we fail to do it, your party, and not mine, will be held responsible for the consequences.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. DALZELL. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CATLIN] 15 minutes.

Mr. CATLIN. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as the bill under consideration seeks to destroy some features, at least, of that economic policy of protection under which this country has steadily made great gains industrially and commercially—has reached out in stupendous expansion and development—I can not refrain from voicing, if but in a few words, my sentiments of disapproval of the measure.

During this debate, to which I have given close attention, much valuable statistical information touching the comparative imports, productions, and duty schedules of the respective articles attacked in this bill has been presented, and so I feel that it would be idle, in the few minutes allotted to me, to indulge further in an extended comparison of figures. My desire and purpose, however, is to enter a plea for the continuance and preservation of the present quality of American citizenship, as exemplified by the splendid standard of living and wage scale, with the attendant blessings and comforts, of the American workingmen, in contrast to the poorer conditions of their class in other countries,—especially in the Orient, where labor is cheap and plentiful,—and therein lies the danger. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I have always been impressed with the force of the moral duty that we owe to the growing youths of this country, sons of the American workingmen,—and with a free-trade bill now threatening the fact comes home to me more than ever—to see to it that they are afforded every opportunity to enjoy all the blessings of decent manhood, such as their fathers have had before them. [Applause on the Republican side.] Let us strive and endeavor to elevate them even to higher levels, rather than be a party to legislation which would put them on a poorer basis!

Past experience has shown that the high standard can only be maintained by an adherence, in substance, at least, to the principle of protection. If we abandon this principle, we will necessarily be confronted with an ever growing peril from the Orient. Whereas, a few years ago, but little heed had to be paid to the producing powers of these oriental countries, now already Japan has entered the industrial arena with telling effect; and, even China, awakened from long lethargy, has at last cast aside some of the ancient traditions, in particular that of race prejudice, so as to have enlightened development. We have but to examine the following trade reports, compiled by the Bureau of Statistics in the Department of Commerce and Labor, to learn that our imports from Japan are increasing, whereas our exports of merchandise to that country are decreasing:

Imports from Japan.

In 1909 we imported from Japan merchandise in the sum of	$70,392,722
In 1908 we imported from Japan merchandise in the sum of	68,107,545
Showing a gain in imports from Japan in the sum of	$2,285,177

Exports into Japan.

In 1908 we exported into Japan merchandise in the sum of	$41,432,327
In 1909 we exported into Japan merchandise in the sum of	26,691,613
Showing a deficit in exports into Japan from this country in the sum of	$14,740,714

This, I think, is significant as showing that Japan is fast becoming an industrial nation, and is reaching out for our markets.

Her government, in the hope of encouraging and upbuilding industries, not only lends financial aid for this purpose, but is also sending her brightest and most energetic men to the United States and other countries to study modern methods of production, and is subsidizing lines of steamships in order that they may carry the finished products to all parts of the world. There are no patent laws there, covering inventions of more than two years ago, to add to the original cost of equipping new factories with the latest types of modern machinery, such as our industrial captains must meet in this country. Take, for example, the boot and shoe industry, the American companies have to pay large royalties on the machinery they use. The Japanese and Chinese have a peculiar aptitude for copying and imitating; after securing some patented machinery, they can readily tear it to pieces so as to learn its component parts for the purpose of having similar ones made to be used in their respective factories.

As is well known, many kinds of modern industries have already been established there and are being operated by labor willing to work for 10 or 12 hours a day, and at a wage scale averaging from 15 to 50 cents per day. It is now proposed to invite this kind of labor to compete with the high wage scale and short hours of the American workingman. Shall we do it? In my opinion, more is to be feared from the competition in the Orient than from that of the European countries. There are about 62,000,000 of people in Japan, including Formosa and Korea; of this number about 43,000,000 belong to the laboring class, as do also the greater part of China's 435,000,000 of people; and, in this discussion of the probable danger from Oriental competition, the large population of India should also be considered, especially with regard to the jute industry in which the average workingman receives but 80 cents per week.

The question then, which confronts us, is this: After these many millions in the Orient have learned in a scientific manner the manufacture of the varied industries, under the management and supervision of Americans, Englishmen, or even their own trained experts, are we going to get their markets or will they capture ours?

It is, therefore, important, Mr. Chairman, for us to continue the policy of protection so as not to come into harmful competition with this Oriental labor. [Applause on the Republican side.] I view with apprehension the time when, under a policy whereby our markets shall be free and open to the Oriental trade, the American wage earners, their products, such as the ones specified in this bill—their present high wage scale and standard of living shall be displaced by the ingenuity, a 30 to 50 cent wage, and by the fish-and-rice diet of the Japanese and Oriental labor.

A few years ago, the Department of Commerce and Labor sent a special representative, Mr. Raymond F. Crist, to Japan for the purpose of studying trade conditions there, and I desire to submit herewith the following extract from his written report made to Congress as bearing on the shoe industry in that country:

> The return of the army from Manchuria will bring back in the neighborhood of a million men who have become accustomed to the use of foreign shoes, many of whom never wore shoes before their enlistment. The desire to continue their use will result in increased production of shoes among the Japanese. Realizing the necessity of meeting this demand, some Japanese shoe and leather goods houses have installed shoe-sewing machines, and many more will be installed as the value of this method of shoemaking over the slow hand process becomes established. American shoe-sewing machine manufacturers would do well to establish representatives in this field at an early date in order to supply the demand for these machines which is now springing up. With a new and higher tariff imposed upon the imports of shoes, which will in all likelihood be inaugurated for the stimulation of the shoemaking industry, the field now controlled by American-made shoes will dwindle into insignificance.

The proposed increased tariff mentioned in the above report has already been levied, namely, a tariff of 40 per cent.

It is unfair to assail the boot and shoe industry by removing the present 10 per cent duty simply because, as has been emphasized and brought out in this debate, one member of the trade appeared before the Ways and Means Committee two years ago and stated:

> That if hides were placed on the free list there would be no further need for a duty.

An examination of the following table, taken from the consular reports, will show that the average cost of production per 100 pairs of medium grade men's welt shoes is nearly twice as much in the United States as it is in the leading European countries:

In England	$27.73
In France	22.20
In Germany	21.90
In Austria	21.70
In United States	49.11

For this reason, the shoe companies of St. Louis maintain that, if the present tariff is removed, they will either have to lower wages or go out of business. I recently asked one of the largest shoe manufacturers there how long he thought it would take the Japanese to compete with the Americans in this market in the event the present tariff should be removed, and he was of the opinion that it would be only a few years, especially as to the trade on the Pacific coast.

The Japanese will have an additional advantage in that they can ship their products, say, boots and shoes, to San Francisco at a cheaper rate than the St. Louis manufacturers, whose total business amounts to about fifty or sixty million dollars a year, or one-sixth of the entire business done in this country, can ship theirs to the same place.

The total imports of boots and shoes from all countries for the year 1909, when there was a 25 per cent duty, amounted to $100,000, yet for the first six months of 1910, when there was only a 10 per cent duty, as at present, the imports amounted to $677,000, or more than six times as much in six months; and, notwithstanding this increase of supply, the price of the article has not decreased.

Mr. Chairman, this has been a country of golden opportunities for all within its confines, because, in their wisdom, a majority of the American people saw fit, for almost fifty continuous years, to protect their industries and products, their wage scale and standard of living from the harmful competition of European countries. The danger is not yet over; still another confronts us in the Orient, where labor is very cheap and the hours of employment long, and which condition, therefore, calls for a continuance of the principle of protection. I, for one, want to guard the present high wage scale and short hours of the American wage earners, the quality of their citizenship and standard of living against any such competition; accordingly, I must oppose this bill, which bears semblance of free trade with the whole world. [Applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ALEXANDER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 4413, and had come to no resolution thereon.

By unanimous consent, the Committee on Foreign Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of H. J. Res. 83, neutralization of Philippine Islands, and the same was referred to the Committee on Insular Affairs.

By unanimous consent, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of H. R. 8143, granting pensions to certain military organizations, and the same was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, Mr. Moss of Indiana was granted permission to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers with the bill H. R. 21966, Sixty-first Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned to meet to-morrow, Wednesday, May 3, 1911, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, May 3, 1911.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., as follows:

Oh, Lord, our God and our Father, whose heart opens with love in response to those who seek Thee diligently, lift us by Thy grace into that purer atmosphere where spirit with spirit can meet and purify and ennoble the soul, that we may work in Thee, through Thee, with Thee, for the uplift of humanity, and, as we pass on toward the home of the soul, leave the world a little better for those who shall come after us. For Thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that this is Calendar Wednesday, and the rules provide especially that nothing shall be done after the Speaker's table is cleared except to call the committees.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I think there are a few bills on the Public Calendar that would be in order to-day, but they do not contain matters of importance. I would like to get through with the debate on the free-list bill. I understand that under the rules we have the right to dispense with the calendar by a two-thirds vote.

The SPEAKER. It takes a two-thirds vote.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I therefore move that the call of the calendar under the order of to-day be dispensed with, so that we may proceed with the bill H. R. 4413—the free-list bill.

The question was taken, and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the motion was agreed to.

NAVY CONTRACTS FOR SHOES.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Naval Affairs, I beg to report back a privileged resolution, H. Res. 134, with amendments, and to move the adoption of the resolution as amended.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read the resolution as proposed to be amended.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve a point of order, and I call attention to the fact that the resolution has not been properly reported by the Clerk.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let the report be read.

Mr. PADGETT. The Clerk has read the resolution as amended. He should have read first the resolution as originally introduced.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois reserve the point of order?

Mr. MANN. I would like to have the resolution reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the original resolution.

House resolution 134.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to send to the House of Representatives full information, as follows, with regard to certain statements made by Hon. ROBERT E. DIFENDERFER, of Pennsylvania, in the House on April 25, 1911:

First. What proportion of the contracts for Navy shoes during the fiscal years 1909, 1910, and 1911 were awarded to the firm of Hermann & Co.?

Second. What are the names of the individuals or firms who have secured contracts for Navy shoes in the fiscal years 1909, 1910, and 1911? What was the amount of each contract?

Third. Have any competitors been blacklisted or disqualified from bidding on any Navy shoe contract in the fiscal years 1909, 1910, and 1911? If so, what were the names of those competitors and what was the cause of their disqualification?

Fourth. What proportion of the Navy shoe contracts in the fiscal years 1909, 1910, and 1911 were awarded to the lowest bidders?

Fifth. How many bidders were there for the last Navy shoe contracts?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point of order on the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows (H. Rept. No. 16):

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred House resolution No. 134, regarding Navy contracts for shoes, having had the same under consideration, report the same back with the following amendments, and, as amended, recommend that the resolution do pass.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the resolution as amended.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves the adoption of the resolution as amended. Is a separate vote demanded on any of the amendments? If not, they will be voted for engross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

SITTING OF COMMITTEE DURING RECESS.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

House resolution 149.

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs have authority to sit during the sessions of the House and during the recess of the Sixty-second Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire whether there is any necessity for the passage of that resolution for this special session?

Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count.

Mr. MANN. Well, Mr. Speaker, having called attention to the fact, I withdraw the point of order, but I suggest that if a lot of committees start to sit during the meetings of the House at this session of Congress there will be great difficulty in obtaining a quorum here unless there is important business to transact.

Mr. PADGETT. I would state to the gentleman that we had called a meeting of the committee yesterday for 11 o'clock, and the House met at that hour and is now meeting at that hour, and it interferes; and also we have two very important bills which we wish to consider—bills of a legislative character—not with a view to putting them on the calendar at this session, but with a view to considering them, maturing them, and having them ready so as to get them out of the way for the next session, when we shall have a congestion of business growing out of the consideration of the appropriation bills.

Mr. MANN. Very well. I withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and the resolution was agreed to.

THE TARIFF.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of H. R. 4413, a bill to put agricultural implements and other articles on the free list.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the free-list bill (H. R. 4413), with Mr. ALEXANDER in the chair.

The bill was read by title.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS]. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, it is not my practice to engage in general debate on subjects which do not come from committees of which I am a member, the reason for this being that it is presumed that members of committees who have heard the testimony on any particular subject are more competent to discuss the question intelligently and to present the facts than are other Members of the House; and, secondly, because I have some reservations as to the value of general debate on any subject at any time.

But this is not like the ordinary case, because this bill comes to the House without any consideration. The Ways and Means Committee did not consider it; its majority did not consider it; its minority did not consider it; and the utter lack of definiteness of the bill would indicate that the person who drew it did not give it much consideration. But it is brought in here with the statement that the majority have had a caucus and decided to pass it as it is, and they ask the country, and especially the trades affected by it, to accept that action without any change or the taking of any evidence.

It is my purpose to try to add something to the testimony which has been submitted in the addresses already made, relating especially to the shoe and leather industry.

I am not unmindful, too, of the fact that it has already been well discussed on this floor; that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], the minority leader, punched the paragraph relating to this subject full of holes, and that my colleagues from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER and Mr. HARRIS] have discussed it ably and well, and that others have referred to it. But I think I may add some information on this subject, which is my only excuse for taking time to-day.

I am going to try to demonstrate, first, that there is no demand for this legislation, at least from the shoe and leather trade; second, that there is no trust or monopoly or combination connected with these industries in any way or shape; and, third, I am going to try to show why American shoes sell in Europe, why English and European shoes sell to a limited extent in this country, and why there is a falling off in sales of American shoes in Europe, and why there is an increase in the sales of foreign-made shoes in this country, which latter increase, I believe, is going to continue.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] stated the other day, and the same statement was made by the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, that the shoe manufacturers of this country appeared before the Ways and Means Committee two years ago with the proposition that if hides were put on the free list they would be willing to stand for free shoes and free leather. A careful investigation of the testimony adduced before that committee indicates that one witness made such a statement, and a few days afterwards, when he had had a chance to revise his figures, he returned, asked for a hearing, and stated that such a statement could not be applied to the trade at large. On two other occasions two other shoe manufacturers have made similar statements. There are 1,322 shoe manufacturers in this country, and of those 1,322, 3 have at some time and in some form made the statement which has been repeated here by the gentlemen on the other side to whom I have referred, and these expressions are the only evidence before the House on which to base this proposed action. The three men referred to are large shoe manufacturers in Massachusetts. One of them is William L. Douglas, former governor of the State, a Democrat, and a very enterprising shoe manufacturer. Gov. Douglas is reported to have said some years ago, at about the time he was a candidate for governor, that if he had free hides he could reduce the price of his shoes, and that he believed that with free hides shoes could be put on the free list and that we could compete with the world. I think he has not been heard to repeat that statement for six years. I have no doubt he was honest in his statement that he believed he could reduce the price of his shoes if hides were put on the free list; but other conditions bearing on this trade have changed since those days, and instead of Gov. Douglas reducing the price of his shoes since hides were put on the free list, he has increased the price of his shoes 25 or 50 cents a pair, and it has been necessary to do so to maintain the same value in the shoe. I do not ascribe to him anything in the way of bad faith on that account, because I think I can show before I finish that there are good reasons for this increase.

One other manufacturer who made a similar statement was Mr. Charles H. Jones, who came here two years ago representing the shoe manufacturers of New England, and I think he represented the shoe manufacturers of the whole country. He is the president of the Commonwealth Shoe Co. and is an able man and a successful manufacturer. Mr. Jones stated before the Ways and Means Committee originally—and he was the man to whom I have referred—that he believed if hides were put on the free list shoes could also be put on the free list, but later he revised his information on that subject, and not only revised his statement made to the Ways and Means Committee, but wrote a letter, of which I submit a copy:

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 20, 1909.

Hon. WILLIAM H. TAFT,
President, The White House, Washington, D. C.

Mr. PRESIDENT: The schedule in relation to hides, leather, and shoes in the Payne bill is as follows:

Hides.	Band and sole leather.	Dressed upper leather.	Shoes.
	Per cent.	Per cent.	Per cent.
Free	5	15	15
Reduction from Dingley rate	75	25	40

The above rates seemed to the trade to offer sufficient protection except on sole leather, which most tanners believe should have been 10 per cent, a reduction of 50 per cent from Dingley rates. It is the feeling of most of the trade that the percentage of reduction shown by the Payne bill should be all that it needed to entitle us to free hides. If, however, as suggested by you this afternoon, still further concessions will be necessary in order to overcome the opposition from certain Senators, I believe, as I stated to you that with—

Hides free we can stand:	Per cent.
Band and sole leather	5
Dressed upper leather	10
Shoes	10

Many tanners will claim that these rates are too low to afford sufficient protection, but after careful examination of all facts and circumstances I can not believe any branch of the industry would be seriously crippled at these rates—certainly if the shoemakers can get along with 10 per cent protection, the makers of leather can do the same. I hope, however, it will not be necessary to cut the rates as hard as this, as it could do the people no good. With free hides, domestic competition will do again what it has always done before in leather and shoes, namely, keep the price to the consumer at the lowest point consistent with the smallest living profit. The rates of the Payne bill with sole leather changed to 7½ per cent or 10 per cent would be satisfactory to practically the whole trade and would show important reductions for the benefit of the consumer.

If you decide, however, that only on the basis of the further reduction mentioned, can free hides be secured, all branches of our trade will cheerfully undertake to meet whatever competition may come to us, and our chances of success will be far better with free hides and low duties on leather and shoes than they could be under the hide tax and the present higher rates on manufactured material.

Very respectfully,

CHAS. H. JONES.

There was no political bearing in Mr. Jones's statement, for, although he is a near Democrat, he came here representing the shoe industry, and that was his final judgment after considering the question with all classes of shoe manufacturers.

The third man who did say at that time, and has repeated his statement recently, that he could compete with the world in shoes, and that they could safely be put on the free list, is Mr. A. E. Little, of Lynn, Mass., the manufacturer of the Sorosis shoe. Mr. Little stated two years ago in a telegram to the present Speaker of this House that he believed that could be done, and Mr. W. L. Little, his partner, I believe, has recently made a similar statement. Mr. W. L. Little says:

I would not care to speak for the other manufacturers, but as far as the A. E. Little Co. is concerned, our business would not be hurt with shoes on the free list. A. E. Little telegraphed CHAMP CLARK that the A. E. Little Co. sold many shoes abroad at higher prices than they brought in this country, and that as the Sorosis shoes were meeting the competition of the English manufacturers on their home ground, there evidently was nothing to fear from the English manufacturers, if they brought their shoes to this country.

A Lynn, Mass., paper, commenting on that statement, says:

The A. E. Little Co. are entitled to the courage of their ignorance. But are they sincere? Or is it only a grab at free daily newspaper advertising and a desire to pose as the one American manufacturer who has shoe producing down to a really economic basis?

Mr. Little knew perfectly well that such an utterance would be grabbed up by every free-trade newspaper as a justification of the attack on the shoe duty. He knew it when he made a similar utterance two years ago. He does not know that free shoes will not injure him. He will not find one manufacturer in a hundred to agree with him, among the well-informed, who know the great advances made in foreign shoemaking and styles within the past two years, not only in England, but in France, Germany, Austria, and even Japan. Is there not a pretty good chance that the other 99 are right and he is wrong? And with the scales as evenly balanced as they are now, and foreign shoe imports increasing tenfold in six months, as they did in the last half of 1910, is it not fool's philosophy to propose to give the foreigners the equivalent of 10 cents on the dollar advantage?

It can certainly do Mr. Little no good for the Government to thus offer a 10 per cent inducement to foreign shoemakers; the almost united opinion of other manufacturers is that it will do the whole American shoe trade much harm; in common courtesy and fairness to his fellowcraftsmen, could he not have restrained himself from this rush to the center of the stage?

I am informed that the A. E. Little shoe is marketed abroad in an unusual way. The manufacturers of that shoe are among the few American manufacturers who sell shoes abroad, and they are among the limited number who sell shoes through their own stores.

There is a shoe manufacturer in Great Britain named Clark who runs a line of shoe stores similar to those familiar to us in this country; he manufactures a man's shoe. The manufacturers of the Sorosis shoe have made an arrangement with Mr. Clark so that they sell their women's shoes, the Sorosis being a woman's shoe, in the same establishment in which the men's shoes manufactured in Great Britain are sold. They have adopted this method of disposing of their goods, and, presumably, it is a profitable one, because it is being followed in Great Britain and, I think, to some extent on the Continent.

One other point about the Sorosis shoe. I have a pair of them here which I purchased yesterday in Washington, paying $4 for them.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. WEEKS. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. Do I understand the gentleman that Mr. Clark, the English manufacturer, and the Massachusetts manufacturing company are selling their goods in this country?

Mr. WEEKS. Not in this country, but in Great Britain and on the Continent.

Mr. CANNON. Are selling them in Great Britain from the same room, one American made and the other English made?

Mr. WEEKS. That is substantially correct. I believe there is a thin partition between the two departments.

Mr. CANNON. Is the gentleman from Massachusetts informed as to whether there is being an international trust formed between these makers of footwear?

Mr. WEEKS. My investigation has not developed that fact. Now, I have here a $4 shoe which three or four years ago would probably have sold at $3.50. It is the ordinary Sorosis shoe.

Mr. KENDALL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. KENDALL. I understand the shoe that the gentleman is now exhibiting sells now for $4, and the current price two years ago was $3.50?

Mr. WEEKS. I did not say two years ago, but I think it would have sold at one time at that price.

Mr. KENDALL. Is it possible that the price of shoes has advanced that much since the tariff was removed?

Mr. WEEKS. I think so.

Mr. KENDALL. In the speeches made by the gentleman and some of his colleagues two years ago, the country was assured that the removal of the duty on hides would have the effect to reduce the price of shoes to the consumer.

Mr. WEEKS. I wish the gentleman would apply that statement to the man who made the speech.

Mr. KENDALL. I was quite sure that I heard such words fall from the lips of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WEEKS. The gentleman from Iowa is mistaken; I never made such a speech or such a statement.

Mr. KENDALL. I am glad to see that the interest of Massachusetts is reviving in the protective-tariff policy. Let me ask another question: In the gentleman's opinion, what is the cause of the increase in the price of shoes?

Mr. WEEKS. I will go into that in detail later. Now, Mr. Chairman, the tops of these Sorosis shoes, and every part except the heel and the sole, is of vici kid, which is dutiable at 15 per cent. The shoe itself is dutiable at 15 per cent under the Payne-Aldrich bill, and will be dutiable at 15 per cent if the bill we have under consideration becomes a law. It is therefore easy for Mr. Little to assure the people that he is willing to have shoes made of cattle hides come in free when his own production is protected at the rate of 15 per cent, and will be if this bill becomes a law as now written. It is possible, of course, that he had not noticed this fact.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I trust that the gentleman from Massachusetts does not mean to insinuate that there can be any selfishness on the part of any manufacturer as to the rates put on shoes.

Mr. WEEKS. Well, I will leave the gentleman to make up his own mind on that score, having given him the facts.

Mr. CANNON. And yet, if I understand the gentleman right, and I want to get the facts into my head correctly, this manufacturer, who seems to be willing that shoes made from hides of cattle should be upon the free list, and this bill, if it becomes a law, leaves 15 per cent duty on the class of shoes he speaks of made by Mr. Little——

Mr. WEEKS. That is correct.

Mr. CANNON. Then he is entirely disinterested, of course. [Laughter.]

Mr. WEEKS. This completes my list of the 3 shoe manufacturers out of 1,322 who have made the public statement that they are willing to have shoes come in without a duty on them.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Is Mr. Little the only man who makes the kind of shoe exhibited by the gentleman from Massachusetts, and on which there is a tariff of 15 per cent?

Mr. WEEKS. No; I do not think he is—oh, no; he is not.

Mr. MADDEN. Are there any of the large American shoe manufacturers who make this kind of a shoe?

Mr. WEEKS. That particular shoe is made alone by Mr. Little, or the A. E. Little Shoe Co.

Mr. MADDEN. Are there any other shoes of this class made?

Mr. WEEKS. There are other types of women's shoes that are made of such material that they would not be put on the free list under this bill.

Mr. MADDEN. What is the percentage of this class of shoe made in this country?

Mr. WEEKS. It is the percentage that would obtain from having some other material than the hides of cattle, the predominant component in making up the shoes.

Mr. MADDEN. What I want to know is, What proportion of all of the shoes made consist of the class of shoes about which the gentleman is speaking?

Mr. WEEKS. I have not that information.

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. KENDALL. Where does this disinterested manufacturer live, who is willing to have everybody's product but his own go on the free list?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Little manufactures in Lynn.

Mr. KENDALL. Massachusetts?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes; Lynn, Mass.

Mr. KENDALL. I thought so.

Mr. WEEKS. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am going to pass to the proposition which was advanced the other day by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CANTRILL], that most of the items in this proposed bill covered products which were controlled by trusts or combinations or monopolies. The shoe industry is one of the best distributed industries in the manufacturing line in the United States. Shoes are manufactured in 32 different States. The industry is increasing very rapidly in sections of the South and West, more so than it is in the East, where the industry originated. I recall only three manufacturers which are capitalized in such a way that the stock has a public market; these are the Regal Shoe Co., the W. L. Douglas Shoe Co., and the McElwain Co. Some preferred stock of each of these companies has a public market. There are many shoe companies in name, but those companies are close corporations in which stock has been issued to the partners and in some cases to the employees, but in no case are they public corporations. I do not know a single case, and I can not find one after considerable investigation, where the owners of any particular company have any interest in any other company. Therefore it is not possible that there can be any combination in the shoe industry in this country.

I want to call to the attention of the House at this time, fearing I may forget it, the fact that most grades of shoes sell at a difference in price based on 25 cents. It may be claimed that there is some combination or this would not be possible, but that is not the case. Shoes sell at $3 or $3.25 or $3.50, and every manufacturer who is making shoes of that general style and price puts into his shoes such value that his shoes will continue to sell. Suppose a man who sells shoes at $3.50 tries to scrimp their value, there are so many other well-known $3.50 shoes on the market that the minute he commences to lessen the value of his product his sales commence to decrease, so he must keep up the quality in order to maintain his output. Competition is keen enough in the shoe industry to bring about that result.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Mr. Chairman, I have been paying a dollar a pair more for my shoes since two years ago, when hides were put upon the free list, and I inquired why. I was told there was an arrangement between the different manufacturers making that class of shoe by which they agreed to raise the price. I do not know whether it is true or not, but I was told that by the people who sold me the shoes.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, there is no truth in that statement. There is no arrangement at all. There is not a scintilla of evidence anywhere that there is any such arrangement. I doubt if the gentleman from New York is paying a dollar more for a shoe than he was three or four years ago—that is, for a shoe of the same value. I think, probably, he is paying 50 cents more.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Made on the same last, by the same parties, claimed to be made of the same kind of leather, and on the same kind of machine.

Mr. WEEKS. It may be that that is true, but the probabilities are that the increase has been 50 cents a pair instead of $1, if the same quality is in the shoe. Now, as to the leather industry. There is no combination in the leather industry. It is true that there are two large leather companies in this country—the Central Leather Co. and the American Hide & Leather Co.—but I am informed they do not manufacture more than 35 per cent of all the leather that is tanned in the United States, probably not more than 30 per cent, without including the tanning which is done for the packers—that is, by Armour & Co., Swift & Co., and Morris & Co., who now tan or stock tanneries, using in this way about one-half of the hides which they produce. The other two large packers do not tan any hides at all, but in any case, including the packers, these companies do not include one-third of all the tanning establishments, in number, in this country, and they do not include more than about 35 per cent of the total output of leather. No one can say—not even "the peerless one" would contend—that 35 per cent of a business in several different hands constitutes a trust or monopoly or combination.

Now, as to the question of machinery. It has been frequently stated, both on this floor and in the public press, that the shoe industry was in the hands of a machinery monopoly—that is, in the hands of the United Shoe Machinery Co., which does a large part of the shoe-machinery business of this country. This company represents a combination made 12 years ago of three companies—the Goodyear Sewing Machine Co., the MacKay Shoe Machinery Co., and the Consolidated & MacKay Lasting Machine Co. Each of these companies furnished fundamental machines to perform a particular class of operations, each independent of the other, but together making up the links of one industrial chain. But, in addition to these main machines, this company owns or controls more than 100 different kinds of machines which are used in the manufacture of shoes. It does not require in its contract that any number of its machines shall be used. In fact, there are 60 different shoe machinery manufacturers in the United States furnishing shoe machines which are working side by side with these fundamental machines of the United Shoe Machinery Co.

Any manufacturer can lease the company's essential machines without being obliged to use any other machine which the company makes. Substantially every factory in the United States uses machines which it has not obtained from the United Shoe Machinery Co. In many cases they come in direct competition with the machines which this company produces. None of the machines which stitch together the pieces of the upper part of the shoe are produced by this company, and necessarily these machines must constitute a large part of any factory's equipment. The direct advantage which the United Shoe Machinery Co. has is that it can furnish all the machines which are used in attaching the soles and heels to the uppers, known as the bottoming room, and I believe it is the only company which can do this.

SUMMARY REGARDING MACHINES USED IN SHOE FACTORY FITTED TO MAKE GOODYEAR-WELT SHOES.

Total operations in factory, hand and machine	185
Hand operations	28
Total machine operations	157
Total operations done on machines not furnished by the United Shoe Machinery Co. or which may be done on competing machines	146

Any manufacturer is at liberty to lease the Goodyear welting machine and the Goodyear stitching machine without being obliged to lease or buy anything else from the company. Any manufacturer can lease the company's essential machines without being obliged to use any other of the many machines which the company makes. He can take the others or leave them, as he pleases, without regard to any lease he already holds.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. WEEKS. I will.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Are these machines protected by patents.

Mr. WEEKS. They are protected by patents.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Are those patents near termination or have they a long time to run?

Mr. WEEKS. They have different times to run, but different patents are being taken out constantly, not only by the United Shoe Machinery Co., but by all other companies.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WEEKS. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Have not a large number of the original patents run out?

Mr. WEEKS. Oh, undoubtedly; because this combination was made 12 years ago and they had been manufacturing machines for many years before 1899.

Mr. MANN. These machines are also protected, as I understand, by 45 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. WEEKS. They are.

Mr. MANN. Which it is not proposed to remove in connection with putting shoes on the free list.

Mr. WEEKS. That is a fact. I do not want to forget it, but I noticed the gentleman from Illinois put in the RECORD the other day a statement made by Mr. Florsheim, a Chicago manufacturer, criticizing this machinery combination, as he termed it, and said if shoes and leather were put on the free list that machinery should be also.

I want to point out what would be the result of putting this machinery on the free list. The United Shoe Machinery Co. not only manufactures in this country, but manufactures in England, France, Germany, and Canada. It was necessary for it to do this in order to maintain its patents in those countries. It manufactures the same machines in those four countries that it does in the United States and it supplies its entire market for machines outside of the United States from those factories. Now, if machinery were put on the free list, they would undoubtedly, if they were going to try to make the best possible return on their capital, manufacture all machines abroad and send them in here, because I have testimony, which I will submit later, showing that the average wage which they pay for labor in their manufactories in Europe is 9 cents an hour, while the average wage paid in this country is 27 cents an hour. They employ in the cities of Beverly, Lynn, and Lawrence, Mass., 5,000 men, who are paid an average of $15.75 a week, the total wage being something like $75,000 a week, or nearly $4,000,000 a year. Now, if their machinery were manufactured on the other side at one-third the labor cost, we can easily see that it would mean the payment of wages not of $4,000,000, to our workmen, but either one-third of that amount to our own workmen or to the workmen of a foreign country. That is what it would mean to put shoe machinery on the free list.

I now yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART].

Mr. BARNHART. What is the fact about some of the manufacturers of this shoe machinery refusing to sell their machinery, but only leasing it?

Mr. WEEKS. The United Shoe Machinery Co. only leases its machinery. It does not sell it at all.

Mr. BARNHART. Why not?

Mr. WEEKS. Because its policy is to lease its machinery. I want to point out to the gentleman some advantages that come to the shoemaker as a result of this policy. Any man of good character can start in the shoe business in this country if he has money enough to furnish working capital for his business. He can go into almost any good town and get a suitable plant built for a shoe manufactory, without a large cost to himself, and have his property exempted from taxation for a term of years. He can obtain from the United Shoe Machinery Co. machinery without any cost to himself, on a lease basis, so that his machinery cost, as far as this company is concerned, is nothing. Therefore this leasing system has tended to stimulate independent shoemakers in the United States and has prevented the combinations which possibly would have been made otherwise.

Mr. BARNHART. Another question. Is it not possible that the price you speak of there might be maintained through the action of the shoe-machinery companies in keeping their lease rates so high that a man, in order to manufacture shoes, would necessarily have to sell his shoes at a higher rate from time to time as this shoe-machinery company might dictate?

Mr. WEEKS. Let me point out to the gentleman from Indiana why it is not possible. In the first place, the average wage paid to labor in the manufacturing industries in this country is about 17½ per cent of the entire cost. The average wage paid to shoemakers in this country is about 22 per cent of the cost of the finished product—4½ per cent more than the average in other industries. The labor cost of a $2.50 shoe—a shoe that costs the manufacturer $2.50—is 22 per cent of that amount, or about 55 cents a pair. The machinery cost of that shoe is not over 4½ cents a pair. The highest machinery cost on any pair of shoes manufactured in this country is 5.09 cents a pair. The lowest machinery cost is one-half cent a pair, and the average machinery cost of all shoes made in this country—there are 260,000,000 pairs made—is but 2⅜ cents a pair. The gentleman from Indiana can easily understand that if the wage cost is 22 per cent of the total cost, which in the $2.50 shoe would be 55 cents a pair, and if the average machinery cost is 2⅜ cents a pair, the machinery cost bears so small a proportion to the cost of the shoe that it is negligible.

Mr. ESCH. Can a manufacturer of shoes lease a portion of his machinery from the United Shoe Machinery Co. and purchase or lease his other portion of machinery from other manufacturers?

Mr. WEEKS. He can; and that is done by a large part of the shoe manufacturers of this country.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want the clerk to read a letter which I send to the desk from a manufacturer of women's shoes in Fort Dodge, Iowa. I use this because it is an admirable statement of what I have been outlining, and which I would like to have time to discuss further, and would do so if the facts were not so clearly stated in this letter. However, before the reading of the letter I will yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER].

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Before the letter is read?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I understood the gentleman to say that the policy on the part of shoe manufacturers of renting machinery with which they made the goods they sell, instead of purchasing the machinery outright, enabled the manufacturers to engage in the business with less capital than would otherwise be necessary?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. And that would tend to increase the number of manufactures?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. If the figures submitted by Mr. HARRIS, of the gentleman's State, are correct, they would show that in 1910 there were 1,316 different concerns in the United States making shoes, when statistics show that 10 years ago there were more than 2,000 concerns making shoes, so that it seems to indicate that the number of concerns is getting less rather than more.

Mr. WEEKS. That is true; but if it had not been for this practice of renting machines I believe that instead of there being 1,316 different concerns now in the United States there would be considerably less. This policy has not prevented people from engaging in the shoe manufacturing business, but it has, in my judgment, decreased the tendency to abandon it.

Mr. JACKSON. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. JACKSON. The gentleman stated the cost of the product in England and in this country, and also stated the cost per pair on shoes costing about $2.50 per pair.

Mr. WEEKS. The labor cost I stated, to which the gentleman refers, is the labor cost of manufacturing the shoe machinery, not the labor cost of manufacturing the shoes.

Mr. JACKSON. Can the gentleman give us the labor cost of manufacturing shoes in this country and in England?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes; I will do that later.

Mr. COX of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. COX of Ohio. I would like to ask the gentleman, before he passes from the feature of foreign patent rights, whether it is not true that American manufacturers are no longer compelled to maintain their plants in Germany in order to retain their patent rights?

Mr. WEEKS. I understand that is correct; but the United Shoe Machinery Co. built a plant in Germany when it was necessary for them to maintain the plant there in order to retain their patent rights.

Mr. COX of Ohio. Now, will the gentleman permit this observation? At the time the American Government had up with the German Government, through the Commissioner of Patents and the Secretary of State, the matter of eliminating this practice, many of the manufacturers in my part of the country—and I think I represent the largest export district in America—were anxious to have that practice or regulation done away with. Our manufacturers held that by means of high-class machinery and help they were able to effect economies by manufacturing in this country and shipping the products abroad. It is true with reference to the cash register and the sewing machine that it is cheaper to make them in Ohio and ship them abroad than to make them in Russia or in Germany, a situation that conflicts with the gentleman's statement with reference to cheaper labor abroad.

Mr. WEEKS. That is true of certain industries, notably with the bridge-building industry. Some industries may be so well developed in this country that they can compete with any foreign manufacturer or with the facilities which any foreign manufacturer has. But I will call attention a little later on to the fact that these facilities are constantly increasing over there, and they are becoming more active rivals all the time. Furthermore, the question of manufacturing in this country or abroad would be largely determined by the proportional cost of labor to the whole cost.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. WEEKS. Certainly; I yield.

Mr. MANN. I will state to the gentleman in that connection that the bill proposes to put biscuits and crackers, and so forth, on the free list, and keeps the duty on nearly all the machinery used in making them. The tariff is paid on that machinery, because it is imported from England. It is not made here.

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish once more to call attention to the fact that the letter now about to be read was written by a shoe manufacturer located at Fort Dodge, Iowa, and it is a statement of his iden of the advantages of using the machinery of the United Shoe Machinery Co.

DECEMBER 16, 1910.

DEAR SIR: My attention has been called to an article appearing in September number of Hampton's Magazine on the shoe-machinery question. The author of this article, while in the main correct, has presented his article in such a way that the reading public are likely to be entirely misled as to any real danger or hardship or oppression. Almost any large business, when dealt with in the aggregate, that is, as to the volume of business and profits, and not by the unit of profit or profit by article, is apt to appear in a false light and create an entirely wrong impression with the public. Specially is this true if the charge is made, as this article states, that the American people are being robbed and that the royalty paid to the United Shoe Machinery Co. constitutes a large share of the cost of shoes and attributes in large degree the high cost of living to this fact. Nothing could be further from the truth. While it is true that the machinery company in large measure controls the shoe machinery industry, it is so by virtue of having the best machinery on the market for the different processes of shoemaking.

Being a manufacturer of shoes (we make women's shoes), I am in a position to speak authoritatively on the subject.

Dealing with the subject as it applies to each pair of shoes, what do we find? We find that the largest amount of royalty that is paid on the highest-priced women's welt shoes is about 4½ cents per pair. Now, this would not appear to be such a large amount to go into hysterics about when compared with the total value of the shoe. This cost is, of course, added in the cost of the shoes, the same as leather, labor, and any items of expense in manufacturing, and, as you see, constitutes a very small amount of the cost or value of a shoe.

A shoe selling to the consumer at $4, $4.50, or $5 would have 4½ cents royalty cost. But what do we get for it? We get, first, as stated, the best made, most efficient machinery ever placed on the market for the different operations of manufacturing shoes. Next, we have the use of a corps of expert machinists, who come without cost to us (sent by the United States Machinery Co. from their different agencies) to set up the machines, teach operators, and keep the machines in repair at all times. We just to-day telegraphed for machinists to come to repair and put in operation two of their machines which became disabled. We are entitled to and get the benefit of improvements on machines by paying freight only on new machines. They send machinists to put up machines, teach operators in every instance, and also at any time if machines are disabled or new operators to be taught.

Royalties are very small, on some machines in the system from $5 to $50 a year. For a few machines operating material is bought from the company, such as nails and wire, but the cost per pair is so very small that it is hard to figure in some instances the cost per pair. I think I can safely and conservatively say that 85 per cent of the shoe manufacturers of the country are perfectly satisfied with the present conditions, with the cost, with the treatment, and with the advantages of having the best-organized concern, employing the best and most competent machinists, who are at all times at the service of the shoe manufacturer.

Now, as to any presumed extortion from the consuming public. What would be the result if we were operating under old conditions? Several different machines for doing the same operations would be on the market, some good, some bad, and some quite indifferent, but none of them with the efficiency of the machines in operation now, because the United Shoe Machinery Co. do not put out machines until they have been thoroughly tested and found absolutely perfect in their operation. This is necessary from every point of economy, because their revenue depends upon the perfect and constant working of the machines, as most of the royalty is paid so much per pair. The shoe manufacturer is not a machinist. When, under old conditions, he bought a machine he had to buy it outright and take his chances on its doing the work as represented by the company selling, and also take his chances on an improvement being made at any time which would make his machinery worthless. He would have to employ an expert machinist, competent to take care of all his machines, which could hardly be done, for the United Shoe Machinery Co. people find they have to and do employ separate machinists for each system of machines. If such a machinist could be employed, he would be a very high-priced man, and the ordinary manufacturer could not afford to pay the price, and if they did they would have to add the extra cost to the cost of the shoe. So, taking the expense incurred by depreciating machinery, which would be constantly occurring in large degree, other than ordinary wear and tear on account of continual supposed improvement, together with the large expense of employing at high salaries expert machinists to take care of and keep in repair the machines, the cost per pair over what it now costs would conservatively amount to four or five times as much as the present royalty system involves. What would be the result? Every small concern and, in fact, every concern except the very largest would be forced out of business, because they would not have capital enough to keep up their machinery account and employ the high-priced experts to take care of it, and we would have a shoe manufacturers' trust far more formidable and costly to the consumers than under present conditions. The fact is that under the admirable organization of the United Shoe Machinery Co. the industry of shoe manufacturing is stimulated, so that any energetic, capable person with a little money can go into the shoe manufacturing business. The development of the shoe industry in the United States in the past few years has demonstrated this. The people to-day are buying better shoes for the same or less money than it would be possible under, strictly speaking, competitive shoe-machinery competition. It might be asked where and how does the United Shoe Machinery Co. make such large earnings? Per pair the profit is small, but in the aggregate, due to their magnificent organization and equipment and the consolidation of the business, the operating cost is reduced and the aggregate profit, of course, large. In other words, they save what would be wasted or dissipated by the old method, and the public is getting their share of this saving.

No one can complain from an economic point of view to a 4½ cent a pair cost in a pair of shoes when that cost would be doubled or trebled under other and less favorable conditions.

I am induced to write this letter in order that a false issue may not be started and the consumer of shoes be led astray by a wrong conception of the matter.

Very truly,

R. O. GREEN.

Mr. HARDY. In connection with the suggestion made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that the machinery to make crackers, and so forth, was imported and a duty paid on it because not made in this country, I noted that the gentleman now occupying the floor [Mr. WEEKS], when the question was raised by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART] as to whether the machinery cost might not interfere with the independents making shoes, stated that the machinery cost of most manufactured articles was between 2 and 4 per cent.

Mr. WEEKS. The gentleman from Texas misunderstood me. I said the machine cost for manufacturing shoes averaged 2½ cents a pair. I was not speaking of other articles.

Mr. HARDY. Now, I want to suggest, with reference to the statement of the gentleman from Illinois, that the machine cost for crackers made a very small per cent of the total cost of crackers, and that therefore the duty paid would be so infinitesimally small in connection with the total cost that it seems to me that ought not to affect the cost of crackers.

Mr. FORDNEY. What is the machinery cost for making crackers?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I stated when I began speaking to-day that I was going to talk about the shoe and leather industry. I think I know something about that, and I do not want to have injected into it some other matter which I have not investigated and concerning which I may not have the information.

Mr. HARDY. The gentleman is right; but I only spoke of that in reply to what the gentleman from Illinois had said.

Mr. FORDNEY. If the gentleman from Massachusetts will permit me, as long as the gentleman's remarks about the machinery cost of manufacturing crackers are in the RECORD, I would like to have in the RECORD a statement of what the machinery cost for making crackers is.

Mr. WEEKS. I should like to have this cracker argument left out of my remarks.

Mr. MANN. The other side of the aisle are very much interested in crackers.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Chairman, just for the purpose of getting the thing clearly in the RECORD, I should like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts whether or not the United Machinery Co., referred to in the letter that has just been read, is the United Shoe Machinery Co., of Massachusetts?

Mr. WEEKS. It is the same company.

Now, Mr. Chairman, one critic of the United Shoe Machinery Co., at least in some respects, is Mr. Charles H. Jones, president of the Commonwealth Shoe Co., to whom I have referred. Notwithstanding his not being entirely in sympathy with this company, I want to read something that Mr. Jones stated in a public interview four years ago as to the advantages of this company's machinery and its methods.

Q. Is it not a fact, as claimed by the advocates of this bill, that the Shoe Machinery Co. is very arbitrary in its dealings with the shoe manufacturers and that its large earnings are a heavy tax on the industry?—A. There are, undoubtedly, some clauses in the different leases which manufacturers are required to sign with the machinery company that give the impression that the company desires to bind the manufacturers and limit them in their business action to an unreasonable extent. At the time of the organization of the machinery company I resented very deeply what seemed to me the extreme and unfair advantage that they were taking of the power which they undoubtedly held over shoe manufacturers, but in the six or seven years during which they have been in operation I must say that I have waited in vain for any unfair or arbitrary use of this power on the part of the company; in fact, their dealings with us have been marked by more consideration than was formerly shown us by many of the constituent companies. It is a fact that must not be overlooked, that if the company is a despotism it has been up to this time of the most benevolent type. It has actually reduced the prices on many of its machines; it has placed others in our hands on a rental system that has saved us a very large investment of capital; it has certainly given more faithful care and attention to the running of the machines and keeping them in order; and in our country factories, where we employ a large proportion of inexperienced help, they have given us more constant and faithful attention in instructing new operators and in the supervision of the machinery under trying conditions than we ever obtained from any of the constituent companies.

Q. Has the charge for such service as you describe been increased over what you formerly paid?—A. I can not say that it has. As far as I recall them, the royalties demanded by the company are the same, exactly in amount, that we have always paid. It is only fair to add that they have supplied us with many additional machines to do the minor parts of the work, without any charge at all. These machines have been of considerable value to us, both in the saving of labor and increasing the uniformity of the goods, and are such machines as would undoubtedly have cost us a round sum if the United Shoe Machinery Co. had not been in position to furnish them to us gratis.

Q. The newspaper reports of the hearings at the legislature made quite prominent the statement that exorbitant prices have been charged by the company for supplies. The prices of tacks and nails in the open market and the price charged by the Shoe Machinery Co. were compared. Do these statements show the facts as they actually exist?—A. I did not see the statements, and so can not answer that question; but if you wish to know whether the company is charging us an unfair price for tacks and nails, will say that this is entirely untrue. The royalty on some of their machines is derived from the price of the tacks and nails used on them; consequently the price which they charge for the tacks and nails is certainly greater than the same thing could be bought in the market for use by hand; but, as a matter of fact the Shoe Machinery Co. charges us no more for tacks to-day than they did many years ago when tacks in the open market were much cheaper than to-day; in fact, my impression is that they have actually reduced the price of tacks between 25 and 30 per cent, while everyone knows that the cost of tacks and nails in the open market has advanced.

Also, in regard to eyelets, which they now manufacture extensively, we are paying them from 10 to 20 per cent less than we formerly paid, although it is perfectly well known that the copper and spelter from which they are manufactured have advanced in price nearly 50 per cent since 1899.

Q. You do not seem to be one of the manufacturers who regard this trust as one of the burdens on the industry?—A. I must say that that is not my view to-day. I am by no means convinced that all their methods are the best, or that their policies might not be changed to make them more liberal in some respects, but I am very glad to say that the expectations I had of what was to be the result of this combination when it was formed have not been borne out by our experience. Up to this time I do not believe any manufacturer who has been honest and straightforward in his dealings with the company can show any clear grievance against the company, or can make out the slightest case of crowding or coercion. On the contrary, I can say for ourselves that the question of royalties and machinery, which was formerly one of the most vexatious and exacting departments of our business, has ceased to give us any concern at all. We were formerly obliged to examine new inventions, and were forced to make experiments with machines for months at a time, with the result that we obtained more or less bad work, and were put to much useless expense, and the thought and attention of our best men was given to deciding between the merits of the old and the new. We were obliged to dicker and trade with every different manufacturer of machinery all the time with the moral certainty that somebody who had more time and attention to give to it would get a better bargain than we were able to obtain, and with it all there was an enormous and perpetual shrinkage on account of the changes made necessary by the introduction and adoption of machinery that was not thoroughly and satisfactorily developed before being placed on the market. To-day this is all changed. If we want a machine, we simply notify the company. Their agent confers with our foreman. The best machine known for doing the work is installed with little or no expense to us. We are obliged to pay a rental in some cases, which would amount to about the same as the yearly shrinkage in value of the machine if we had had to buy it, but the capital which we would formerly have been called upon to invest is still in our possession for use in our regular business. We are confident that we are getting the machine on as favorable terms as any competitor, and we are enabled to employ our own time and ability in the legitimate branches of our business, and we have not, up to this time, been obliged to pay as much for this privilege as we formerly paid, for the very much less satisfactory condition. It may be true that the Shoe Machinery Co. suppresses inventions, but my own experience with outside manufacturers during the past five or six years has gone quite a way toward convincing me that the outside inventor gets all the consideration from the company to which he is entitled. We have encouraged a few of them that we thought had good things, only to be sold out by them as soon as they could make a satisfactory trade with the company.

I wish to summarize some of the facts relating to this company and its business. The highest royalty charged in the manufacture of any shoe—the Goodyear welt men's shoes—is 5.09 cents per pair; for women's Goodyear welt shoes the royalty charged is 4.24 cents per pair; for McKay shoes, 1.75 cents per pair; for Goodyear turned shoes (both of the latter women's shoes), 1.1 cents per pair. This rental includes installation of machines, maintenance of machines, depreciation, all care of machines, and repairs, except the cost of new parts. The royalties charged abroad—and exactly the same methods are followed in other countries which prevail here—are the same as in the United States. It is claimed that the company has furnished its lessees with the very best equipment obtainable at all times; that it always substitutes improved machines for those which have become out of date; that since the combination was formed it has eliminated payments which were previously required for the installation of machines; that it has reduced its rentals and royalties, both directly and indirectly—the latter by furnishing auxiliary machines without additional royalty charge. It has constantly increased the efficiency and extent of its service; it has spent from $300,000 to $750,000 a year since the organization of the company in maintaining a corps of inventors and developers in its experimental department. During this time nearly 100 new machines have been developed by the company, and by the use of these new machines it is believed that manufacturers save annually in cost of production an amount greater than the royalties paid at the time the company was organized, 12 years ago.

I now take up the third proposition which I stated at the outset, and that is, why English shoes are sold in this country, why American shoes are sold in Europe, and why the shoe sales in many European countries are not increasing, and other matters relating to that subject.

We were the earliest and best developers of shoe machinery, which is the basis of the great prosperity in the shoe manufacturing industry to-day. As I have said, it only costs 2½ cents to make shoes with this machinery, while if labor had to be used the cost would probably be many times as much. The machinery is so well developed that it makes a better shoe, on the whole, than we would be likely to get if it were handmade.

Most of our shoes sold in Europe are made by a few manufacturers. George E. Keith is the largest seller, probably selling one-third of all the American shoes now sold in Europe. He has 23 shoe stores in Great Britain, 5 in London, 1 in Paris, and 1 in Brussels. Quite likely Mr. Keith makes more per pair by selling in this way than he would in any other. In any case, it is carrying out the same methods which prevail in this country, developed during the last 20 years by our large shoe manufacturers. Among the other large sellers abroad are the makers of the Sorosis, the W. L. Douglas, the Regal, and the Hanan. American shoes sold abroad are largely sold through these shoe stores established by the manufacturers themselves. They are not sold through jobbers to the same extent that shoes are in this country.

Now, why do people buy them if they can buy as good a shoe at the same price made in their own country, as they undoubtedly can? I do not believe that an American shoe ever sold on the other side on account of its being cheap in price, but because it had more style and fitted the foot better. In fact, we do not sell any low-priced shoes in Europe.

The shoes that we sell there are all shoes varying from $3.50 to $7 a pair. They sell, first, because there is a large colony of Americans, especially in Paris, London, and other centers, who naturally buy the American product. Then there are people in Europe who like to buy things made abroad. In addition, there are thousands and tens of thousands of Americans traveling in Europe who naturally buy the shoe that they would buy at home if they were here. These classes furnish a large per cent of the market we are finding for our shoes abroad, and this business is being extended. My attention was called the other day to one of these American shoemakers who started a store in Sofia. This was no sooner done than a capitalist living there, attracted by the character of the shoe, thought it would be a good business, went to Germany, and made arrangements with the United Shoe Machinery Co. to start a manufacturing plant in Sofia. Then he went to Paris and raised additional capital, so that he is going to establish a manufacturing plant in Constantinople, one in Bucharest, and one at some other point in the Balkans; I do not recollect just where.

But we are not selling more shoes in Great Britain than a year ago; we are selling less, because the English have got on to our methods and our form and our style. We are selling more shoes in Canada, Cuba, and Mexico—very many more—in fact, nearly the entire increase in our sales abroad is in these countries. We are selling these shoes because the countries mentioned are near at hand, can buy more readily, and get quicker delivery than if they buy elsewhere. But our European trade is not increasing. That with Great Britain and France is actually falling off. Another reason, which I have neglected mentioning, why our shoes sell in Great Britain is that we have always made a shoe of better style. We have always made half sizes in shoes. The English for many years made their shoes varying from one size to another—a three or a four or a five, but no three and a half or four and a half or five and a half. They made only one width, or at most two, in each style. A friend of mine has told me recently that he went into many shoe stores in a city of 300,000 people in Great Britain, some seven years ago, and tried to buy an English shoe of more than one width, but he could not find such an article in any shoe store in that particular city. We make seven and eight widths for each size of shoe. That is one of the elements in increasing the cost in our shoe manufacturing business. We manufacture so many varieties of shoes, so many sizes, and so many forms.

That condition, however, is what originally gave us this foreign trade. We fit the foot of the purchaser; and, therefore, when a man has worn an American shoe once his disposition is to wear the same American shoe again. These methods have been adopted by foreign manufacturers, who have sent their men over here, putting them into our factories, buying our lasts, and getting our ideas, so that they are in time going to manufacture as good shoes in Great Britain and in France and in Germany as we do in this country. I do not mean shoes having as much value of material in them—because they have always put the value of material into the shoes—but shoes that will fit the foot—that have the style—and, therefore, are likely to sell as well as ours. The same condition is true in the manufacture of leather.

A few days ago I was informed by a tanner of leather in Massachusetts, one who has been shipping a large quantity of leather to Great Britain, that he had been informed by his customers there that the German and French leather was now quite as good as ours, and could be had at lower prices than they were paying in this country. Incidentally, the vici kid that I have spoken of, which composes the upper of the Sorosis shoe, was a German patent, which our people took up and developed in this country. Two former Members of this House, Mr. Foerderer and Mr. Burke, of Pennsylvania, were the developers of vici kid; they built up a very large trade in this country by using this German patent and making a product suitable for the market and also sellable abroad. Now, those people on the other side are making use of their own patents, and have developed a leather which fairly well meets the requirements of the trade which our leather has heretofore supplied.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say, with the gentleman's permission, that I spent over a year in Scotland, and you can not possibly detect the difference now in some of the best quality of English-made shoes from the American shoes. I have been fooled a number of times myself in the purchase of shoes, supposing I was buying an American shoe, when, in fact, it was an English-made shoe.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have passed around this shoe which I hold in my hand having the toe cut off, because it is a sample of the best class of American-manufactured shoe. It is the Goodyear welt shoe, made for women. The section shows the connection between the inner sole, the upper, the welt, and the outer sole. I think it may be of some interest, because it represents the best product of our machine-made shoe and indicates the ingenuity required to develop machinery which will do all of this work.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman, while the shoe is going around, permit one question?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to wait for the shoe to get around; but I will say to the gentleman that I will yield to him for a question.

Mr. HARDY. If one of your companies can maintain and establish 23 houses in Great Britain in competition with the shoemakers of that country there, why can they not do it here?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I have explained to the committee why those houses have been established over there—because we were making a shoe of an excellent style, a shoe which fitted the foot, and our competitors were doing neither.

Our shoemakers made a shoe which was sold to American travelers and American residents over there and other people who liked it better than the shoe which was made there. Now, the English manufacturer is using the same last, frequently purchased in this country, and he is using the same machinery——

Mr. HARDY. Is it the gentleman's conclusion that these 23 houses established by an American factory would have to be closed in Great Britain?

Mr. WEEKS. Oh, people are very largely influenced by custom and habit. I do not think they will be immediately closed, but I am told that some of them are not profitable to-day, while some have worked up a profitable trade. It depends upon the local conditions. I do not think they will be closed this year or next year. I do not think they will be even if shoes are put on the free list, but eventually I feel positive they will go out of business in the countries referred to. Such ventures are seldom profitable at once; it takes time, capital, and experience to build up a profitable foreign trade.

Mr. HARDY. Now, I am asking for information, because I understood gentlemen the other day to say they bought the same kind of shoes in London much cheaper than they were sold here, and I did not understand the gentleman to deny that, and I would like to ask now, Is it a fact that those shoes are sold cheaper abroad than here?

Mr. WEEKS. It is not a fact. I do not believe you can buy an American-made shoe in London a cent cheaper than in this country. On the contrary, in some stores in some places it will sell at a higher price. The United Shoe Machinery Co., manufacturing its machinery abroad, as I have shown, at one-third of the labor cost in this country, leases it abroad exactly as it is leased in this country and at the same rate. There is no foreign manufacturer getting a single machine of the hundred and some odd made by the United Shoe Machinery Co. one penny cheaper than that machinery is being leased for in this country.

Mr. HARDY. What I wanted was the statement from the gentleman that it is not a fact that shoes made here are sold cheaper abroad than at home.

Mr. WEEKS. I do not know of any such case and do not believe it exists.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman such time as may be necessary to permit him to conclude his remarks.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I will try not to intrude upon the time of the committee any longer than necessary, but I have been delayed somewhat by questions.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. If it be a fact, as the gentleman stated, that American manufacturers are not selling their shoes in the English market cheaper than they are selling them here, has the American manufacturer anything to fear from the competition of English shoes in this country?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, that is a pretty difficult question to answer definitely, but I will try to answer it before I finish my statement.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman just at that point to see if I understand it. I understand the United Shoe Machinery Co. of America charges the same license for their machinery and that they manufacture at a less labor cost in Europe than here.

Mr. WEEKS. Absolutely.

Mr. CANNON. Now, then, I understand that they are selling that machinery, manufactured abroad at a less labor cost, to the foreign manufacturer and that he engages in the manufacture of shoes abroad at one-half or less the labor cost with the same kind of machinery that comes in competition under this bill with American-made shoes——

Mr. WEEKS. That is true, except they do not sell the machinery; they lease the machinery there, as they do here.

Mr. CANNON. Now, the machinery which they lease is similar in Europe to that used in the United States, and it is leased upon the same terms; but in the United States, as I understand the gentleman, and that is what I want to ask him, the cost of operating the machinery in the shoe factory is at least double what it is in Europe. Is that correct?

Mr. WEEKS. That is substantially correct; I am just coming to the question of labor cost.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, are not two statements inaccurate? Last and style have nothing to do with the machinery leased by this company, both to the English and American manufacturer.

Mr. WEEKS. The last is an entirely different matter from the machinery, of course. But they are buying their lasts over here in order to get our styles.

I want to add one word to my answer to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], to the effect that the machinery cost of shoes is less in this country than it was five years ago. It is less than it was 10 years ago, when the combination was formed. It is the only item which goes into the making up of a shoe which has not increased in cost in the last 10 years, and the machinery cost is the only item going into the making of shoes abroad which is not cheaper abroad than it is in this country. Every article that goes to make up the shoe, in small ways, as well as the leather, is cheaper abroad than it is here.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield for one other question?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Do the English shoes of the same grade sell in the English market for a less price than an American shoe of that grade?

Mr. WEEKS. It is pretty difficult to tell. If they are not of as good style——

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. The inquiry of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and the answer to the same would indicate that the Englishman may make his shoes of the same grade cheaper than the American. You have stated that the American gets as large a price in England as he does here. I think it would be quite as important to be informed as to whether the Englishman is getting a larger profit upon the same grade or whether he is selling cheaper.

Mr. WEEKS. It is difficult to say when a shoe is of the same grade, although they are made by the same machinery and on the same last. It is a question of finish. The English use some different methods from ours in making their shoes. They use hand labor instead of machine labor, in some instances, which adds something to the cost of the shoe.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. The question of grade would be the controlling question with the purchaser, would it not?

Mr. WEEKS. The question of style, and whether the shoe fitted his foot or not—such things are taken into consideration and are frequently the controlling factors in deciding what shoe one will buy.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Can the gentleman tell us anything about the custom that is said to prevail in certain European countries of marketing as American made goods that are made at a cheaper wage rate in Europe than in the United States?

Mr. WEEKS. I do not know anything about it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The consular reports frequently tell us that is the practice, namely, that shoes made abroad are labeled "American-made shoes," and in this way obtain popularity in foreign markets.

Mr. WEEKS. It is possible that is so, but I have not investigated that subject.

Mr. MURRAY. May I ask the gentleman whether or not he has any figures which he can give us on the relative efficiency of American shoe laborers and foreign shoe laborers?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I have not any definite figures on that subject, but this machine labor is largely controlled and limited by the agreements which are made with the unions in both countries, to a greater extent abroad perhaps than it is in this country. For instance, a welter of shoes in Brockton, Mass., welts 22 dozen pairs a day. If he is a skilled man he may finish his day's work at 3 o'clock in the afternoon. In this respect, I should say, it is something similar to piecework. But I see no reason why the shoemaker of England should not be as competent a man as the shoemaker in this country. He is not, however, able to complete as much in the way of finished product, because the methods over there have not been as up-to-date as our methods; that is, they have in the past used more hand labor, and, in consequence, less machine work has been done. But all of these conditions are being gradually changed to conform to those which obtain in this country.

Mr. CONNELL. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CONNELL. The gentleman has stated that a great deal of the trade in American shoes abroad comes from Americans who travel abroad?

Mr. WEEKS. Undoubtedly.

Mr. CONNELL. I wonder if there are any statistics on that subject?

Mr. WEEKS. I do not think it would be possible to get statistics on it.

Mr. CONNELL. Is it not a fact that the average American traveling in Europe is more apt to buy the thing that is made abroad for the novelty of the thing?

Mr. WEEKS. That might be true of other articles of wear, but I do not think it would be true with respect to shoes. My little experience and the inquiries that I have made upon that subject would lead me to a directly contrary view. Americans abroad are sight-seeing and they can not take chances on wearing ill-fitting shoes.

Mr. AUSTIN. Now, I would like to ask the gentleman if it is not true that our Consular Service, our consuls abroad, have reported that since the introduction of the American machinery in the manufacture of shoes our trade in Great Britain and on the Continent has fallen off?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes; our trade is falling off in Great Britain and on some parts of the Continent.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to continue the third proposition which I advanced when I commenced to speak, regarding the sales of shoes abroad and here, the cost of labor, and other items which bear upon that proposition. We make in the United States 260,000,000 pairs of shoes in a year at this time. The average labor cost is $460 a year to those engaged in the manufacture. There is considerable difference in the wages paid to labor in the different sections of this country which I want to point out, not because the highest wage is paid in the State which I in part represent, but because it shows the benefit which accrues to the laboring man from increasing the output to the full capacity of a factory and locality—the advantage which comes from developing the industry to the highest possible degree of efficiency.

For instance, Brockton, in Massachusetts, is the largest shoe manufacturing point in the United States, and the highest average wage paid to shoe workers in the United States is paid in Brockton. The next largest manufacturing point in the United States, excluding one or two points in California, where a limited business is done, is Lynn, Mass., and the second highest rate of wages paid in the United States is paid in Lynn. The wages paid there are materially higher than the wages paid in most other Massachusetts cities and towns and very much higher than the average paid elsewhere in New England, and so much higher than the average paid in other parts of the country that you will see the probable advantage in developing these industries at certain points to the highest degree of efficiency.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. SHERLEY. The statement of the gentleman as to the rates of wages is very interesting. Does it not also show that the laborers' compensation is not entirely dependent upon the tariff, if they are getting different rates in this country?

Mr. WEEKS. I think that is true. I do not think anyone will contend, and I do not believe it has ever been contended on this floor by anybody who has ever given serious consideration to the subject, that the difference of wage paid to labor in this country and other countries depended entirely upon the tariff.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman's statement as to "those who have given serious consideration to the matter" lets him out. [Laughter.] It has been stated repeatedly on this floor that the rate of wages depended on the tariff.

Mr. WEEKS. I give these figures, not to reflect in any way upon other parts of the country, but because they are interesting and should go in the RECORD.

In the Southern States the shoe industry from 1900 to 1905 increased 110 per cent. It is increasing in some of the sections of the West much more rapidly than in New England. For instance, Ohio has become the third largest shoe-manufacturing State in the Union, and Missouri has become the fourth, the industries in those States being largely centered in Columbus and Cincinnati in the one State and in St. Louis in the other. There are 3,363 people employed in this industry in the Southern States, and their wages are $897,000 a year, or about $266 each.

The average wages paid in the Atlantic States, which includes New York and Pennsylvania and Delaware and Maryland, is $423, or a little less than the average wage for the whole country. There are 30,277 people employed, and their wages are $12,802,835 a year.

The average wage for the Central States, which include the Mississippi Valley States and Ohio, where there are 35,753 people employed and their wages are $14,377,281 a year, is $402 per year. The average wage in Ohio itself, where there are 13,890 people employed and their wages are $5,222,723 a year, is $379; and in Missouri, where there are 10,428 people employed and their wages are $4,335,005 a year, it is $414. The average wage for New England, where there were 79,537 people employed and their wages were $40,462,957 for 1905, which is the year to which these figures apply, was $508. The average wage in Massachusetts for that year was $562.29.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I would like to ask the gentleman if the shoe workers themselves generally are unionized?

Mr. WEEKS. I think so; almost entirely so.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Then the statement of the President about the Shoe Workers' Union was correct—that they did voice the sentiment generally of the shoe workers?

Mr. WEEKS. Undoubtedly.

Mr. MURRAY. May I ask the gentleman whether or not it is a fact that there are two very highly organized unions in this trade, between which there is a very keen rivalry on most public questions of this sort?

Mr. WEEKS. I know there are two organizations.

Mr. MURRAY. Does the gentleman know that there is some rivalry between them?

Mr. WEEKS. On some questions there is keen rivalry, but I do not think there is any rivalry between them as to their desire to get a suitable recompense for their services. [Laughter.]

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. The gentleman has just stated the average wages in various sections of the country in the shoemaking business.

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I will ask the gentleman whether that is an increase or a decrease as compared with the wages paid a few years ago?

Mr. WEEKS. That is an increase, a decided increase.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Since 1890?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes; and since 1895 and 1900, too.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I have some figures here which show that in the year 1900 the average wage paid throughout the country was $437.

Mr. WEEKS. I am talking about the shoe industry. I am not touching other industries now.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I am talking about the shoe industry; but probably I have included some other industries in these figures. But I think these figures are prepared to cover shoes.

Mr. WEEKS. I could not answer the question if it includes other industries than shoemaking. I am not talking about other industries.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to make some comparisons between the wages paid to machine shoe workers in various cities of this country and abroad. For instance, the welter in six St. Louis shoe manufactories gets 41 cents an hour. In two Newark, N. J., factories he gets 67½ cents an hour, and in several Brockton factories he gets from 55 to 70 cents an hour. The Goodyear welters working on women's shoes in four Lynn, Mass., factories get 50 to 60 cents an hour; in two Brooklyn factories from 55 to 65 cents. These are sample wages which I have had looked up.

Lasters in Great Britain receive $7.75 a week. Lasters in the United States, on an average, receive $18 a week. The welter in Great Britain receives $9.35 a week. The welter in the United States receives $25 a week. The stitcher in Great Britain receives $9.37 a week. The stitcher in the United States $25 a week. The heeler in Great Britain receives $8.25 a week, and in the United States he receives $18, and in some cases a great deal more.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEEKS. Certainly.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Can the gentleman give any idea of the relative efficiency of the two kinds of labor?

Mr. WEEKS. I do not think there is any great difference in the efficiency.

Mr. SHERLEY. But can the gentleman give any actual figures of efficiency? That is a necessary factor in the case.

Mr. WEEKS. I have said that the welter in Brockton is limited to 22 dozen pairs a day. In the English factory he works a greater number of hours, but probably he does not do any more than the workman in this country, although he may work more hours. I have not the statistics to demonstrate the accuracy of that statement.

Mr. SHERLEY. Is the difference as to the price in this country due to the difference in efficiency of the workman? The gentleman has shown that there is a marked difference in the wages between different parts of this country, in some cases as much as 33 per cent.

Mr. WEEKS. Yes; but wages are different in all industries in different parts of this country.

Mr. SHERLEY. But does the gentleman say that that difference is on account of the difference in efficiency?

Mr. WEEKS. No; not entirely; but in places where business is carried on on a large scale better labor is developed, and generally better labor conditions prevail.

Mr. SHERLEY. I will say, in all fairness to the gentleman, that I am trying to get the data to show whether or not that may not also explain the difference in the price between the average American and the average English wage. If these figures are to be of value they must carry with them all the factors in the equation.

Mr. WEEKS. It is difficult to do that. If the gentleman from Kentucky were a manufacturer and he had a hundred lasters in his employ, it would be difficult for him, even in his single factory, although he might be familiar with them and their work, to determine what was their relative efficiency, and put that efficiency in figures. There would be a difference in the men and in the work they could do, and I do not see how such figures could be prepared for a section or the whole country without including the hours employed and the product finished, both of which conditions are frequently governed by agreements with the labor employed. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to go on. The cutters in Great Britain get $8.50 a week and in this country $21.

Let me compare these with the wages on the Continent. Machine workers in France get $7.50 a week, somewhat less than the wage in Great Britain. In Germany they get $6.39 a week. The average wage in this country for similar work is three times that. The best comparison I have been able to make between the average wage in the shoe industry in European countries and this is that they get on an average 40 per cent of as much wage as our people do.

Mr. THAYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. THAYER. Is there any great immigration of skilled shoemakers from France to this country?

Mr. WEEKS. I think so.

Mr. THAYER. Has the gentleman any statistics on that subject?

Mr. WEEKS. I have not.

Mr. THAYER. Now, one other question on a subject the gentleman has already covered, but I had to get a statute to verify my belief. When the gentleman spoke of the beneficent operation of the United Shoe Machinery Co.——

Mr. WEEKS. I did not refer to it as "beneficent."

Mr. THAYER. That was the tenor of the gentleman's remarks.

Mr. WEEKS. I referred to it to show that it was not a monopoly.

Mr. THAYER. Did the gentleman have in mind the statute—the act of 1907, in Massachusetts, chapter 469—which was passed against this very corporation?

Mr. WEEKS. I did not have it in mind, but I am perfectly familiar with it.

Mr. THAYER. I would like to have that read.

Mr. WEEKS. I object to having it read in my time. The gentleman can put it in the RECORD in his own time, if he sees fit.

Mr. FINLEY. In referring to the wages paid those engaged in the shoe industry in England and the United States, is it not a fact that the wages paid are based upon piecework rather than by the day or week?

Mr. WEEKS. No; I do not think there is very much work done based on piecework. There is some in all industries, but I do not think that the workingman is generally inclined to adopt that basis for his agreement with his employer.

Mr. FINLEY. Has the gentleman the figures to show the amount of work turned out by the American workman in a day or a week as compared with the amount turned out by the English workman in a day or a week?

Mr. WEEKS. No; I have not.

Mr. FINLEY. Does the gentleman not think that, in order to make the comparison accurate, that should be included?

Mr. WEEKS. It would be a very difficult thing to get, because it would vary in every factory; and I do not think there are any statistics, either in this country or abroad, that would furnish the data.

Mr. FINLEY. I beg to differ with the gentleman. I have seen such statistics. I do not have them in mind at present.

Mr. WEEKS. I should be glad to have my attention called to them, because I do not know of any.

Now, I want at this point to call attention to the fact that the English Board of Trade has very recently been making some investigations in this country as to the conditions of labor and wages and the cost of living. I will print these newspaper clippings relating to the subject. Briefly, this report shows that, assuming that a man in Great Britain gets a dollar a day, the same man doing the same work in this country would get $2.30 a day, and that the cost of living in this country is 52 per cent higher than it is abroad. The report is most voluminous and is along similar lines to the instance just quoted. The following article with reference to the British Board of Trade's inquiry is from the Boston Transcript:

WAGES, OURS AND BRITAIN'S—A REVIEW OF THE BRITISH GOVERNMENT'S INQUIRY—THE EXHAUSTIVE MANNER IN WHICH THEIR INVESTIGATORS WENT INTO OUR EXCELLENT CONDITIONS—LIVING FOUND MORE COSTLY HERE, BUT WAGES MUCH HIGHER STILL—WHAT THE EXAMINERS SAW IN BOSTON—SOME STRIKING LESSONS TO US AS WELL AS TO ENGLAND IN THE FIGURES THEY PRESENT.

[By F. W. Coburn.]

The British Board of Trade's inquiry into the cost of living in American towns, the document which, with its frank admission of the better estate of American workmen, at least one Tory organ has declared to have dealt a deathblow to free trade, has just reached these shores. Press dispatches this past fortnight have told of excitement caused in the tight little island by its findings. John Bull has long hugged the delusion that while 'Arry and Hobbs were paid smaller wages than those received by working people in Brother Jonathan's realm, the situations, at least, were essentially evened up by the much higher cost of living in "the States."

Now comes the relentless statistician of the labor department of the board of trade to prove, after an exhaustive study of 28 cities of the United States, that the English workman who emigrates and successfully reestablishes himself in an American community gets wages that are about 130 per cent better than he had received, while his expenditures for food and rent are advanced only by about 52 per cent. He makes by removing his Lares and Penates.

Technically the inquiries included "the collection of statistical data as regards wages and hours of labor, rents, prices, and family expenditures on food."

It is the generalizing summaries, of course, which have disturbed British complacency. The results of the international comparison show that the ratio of the weekly wages for certain occupations in the United States and England and Wales, respectively, at the dates of the two inquiries was 243 to 100 in the building trades, 213 to 100 in the engineering trades, 246 to 100 in the printing trades, and 232 to 100 in all the trades together. Allowing for a slight advance in wages in England and Wales between the dates of the two inquiries the combined ratio would be 230 to 100.

MORE MONEY AND LESS WORK HERE.

Not only do American workmen receive much higher wages, the British investigators are obliged to admit; they work shorter hours. The weekly hours of labor on this side were found to be 11 per cent shorter in the building trades, 7 per cent shorter in the printing trades, and 6 per cent longer in the engineering trade, the combined ratio showing up as 96 to 100 in this country's favor.

As regards rent, it was found that the American workman pays a little more than twice as much as the English workman for the same sort of housing. The actual ratio is 207 to 100. The difference between the two countries is much less marked in the retail prices of food, exhibiting a ratio of 138 to 100.

Almost interminable family-budget studies lead to the conclusion, which might have been expected a priori, that "the consumption of meat is much larger in the United States, and the consumption of vegetables is also larger. The budgets indicate in general that the dietary of American working-class families is more liberal and more varied than that of corresponding families in the United Kingdom.

This monumental inquiry, one learns, was begun in February, 1909. It investigated 28 cities, all but two of them lying east of the Mississippi. These American towns were as follows:

New York.

New England towns: Boston, Brockton, Fall River, Lawrence, Lowell, and Providence.

Other eastern towns: Baltimore, Newark, Paterson, and Philadelphia.

Central towns: Cincinnati, Cleveland, Detroit, Louisville, Muncie, and Pittsburg.

Middle West towns: Chicago, Duluth, Milwaukee, Minneapolis-St. Paul, and St. Louis.

Southern towns: Atlanta, Augusta, Birmingham, Memphis, New Orleans, and Savannah.

Mr. MADDEN. Then the man who gets 130 per cent more and pays 52 per cent higher for his living cost would be 78 per cent better off?

Mr. WEEKS. Of course he would.

In the year ending June 30, 1910, the value of the imports of shoes into this country—I want you to listen to these figures, because they are rather illuminating—was $171,807. The duty on those shoes was from 10 to 15 per cent; on some of them 10 per cent, under the Payne-Aldrich bill, and on some of them 15 per cent. It averaged almost exactly 13 per cent on the total. The total duty on the goods was $22,695. The labor cost on these shoes in this country would be 22 per cent of the value of the shoes—that being the average cost for the whole of the United States.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Does the gentleman mean the labor cost of the shoe itself, or the labor cost of everything going into the shoe, including the making of the shoe?

Mr. WEEKS. I mean the labor cost in making the shoe. The labor cost of the 1910 importations would be $37,685 in this country on that basis.

The labor cost abroad, figuring it at 40 per cent of our labor cost, which would be almost exactly the English board of trade figures, would be $15,074, a difference in labor cost of $22,611. Twenty-two thousand six hundred and eleven dollars is within $84 of the actual duty collected on these goods. In other words, the difference in labor cost and the duty of 13 per cent were substantially the same amount. That seems to be a scientific tariff, based on the difference between the cost of labor at home and abroad. [Laughter.]

Mr. MURRAY. May I suggest an inaccuracy that occurred to me as the gentleman went along—that the amount of duty collected was $37,000.

Mr. WEEKS. The amount of duty collected was $22,695. I read the wrong figures.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman has stated these figures demonstrated that this is a scientific tariff. It is not in accordance with the Republican platform, is it, because it eliminates a reasonable profit to the manufacturer?

Mr. WEEKS. I added a scientific tariff, based on the difference in the cost of labor abroad and at home.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But the gentleman does not take any credit for a tariff of that character.

Mr. WEEKS. We take all the credit we can get. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, with further reference to a comparison of wages at home and abroad, I should like to ask my colleague whether it is not true that under the German regulation, which compelled the American manufacturer to maintain his plant on German soil in order to keep his patent rights, he operated there and sold in the German market, and was not compelled, in consequence, to pay the German tariff.

Mr. WEEKS. That is my impression, though I am not sure.

Mr. COX of Ohio. Now, further than that, about a year ago the Commissioner of Patents and the Secretary of State, at the behest of business interests in this country, induced Germany to give up that regulation. Is that not true?

Mr. WEEKS. I think that was given up about two years ago.

Mr. COX of Ohio. Is it not true that it was given up at the behest of American manufacturers?

Mr. WEEKS. I do not know at whose behest or for what reason, but the Germans do now impose a tariff upon our manufactured goods which would offset the difference.

Mr. COX of Ohio. Is it not a matter of historic truth that the change was brought about by the intercession of our Commissioner of Patents and the Secretary of State?

Mr. WEEKS. I do not know about that.

Mr. COX of Ohio. And, further, because the American manufacturer so desired.

Mr. WEEKS. I am willing that should go as a statement of the gentleman from Ohio, which I have not investigated.

Mr. COX of Ohio. Well, it is correct, absolutely. And the point is this—if the alleged cheap help made possible cheaper products abroad, then why do American manufacturers ask Germany to remove the patent regulation in order that the American plants can be brought home?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, the only case in point which bears on the subject which I am discussing is the United Shoe Machinery Co., which was manufacturing in Germany before this change was made. Now, I want to call to the attention of the committee the fact that we are actually receiving in this country English shoes. I would like to have the members of the committee look at these shoes which I have here on my desk, from which they can determine whether they think the Englishman can make good-looking shoes. These are all English shoes, made either in Nottingham or Leicester. They are offered for sale in Boston and quite likely in other parts of the country.

I am informed that these or similar shoes are being contracted for by the Kendall Co., of Kansas City, and by other shoe jobbers. It was stated in the Boot and Shoe Recorder of April 26 that five English drummers have been offering English shoes in Boston, and a Leicester man told me only yesterday that a Leicester manufacturer had received an order from the United States for 5,000 pairs of English shoes a week based on samples he submitted, but that his factory was not large enough to warrant his filling it, though he could ship a part of his supply to this country and make money at the price offered. The increase in the shipment of English shoes to this country, while not large in the years 1908, 1909, and 1910, will be a considerable factor this year.

If the second half of the year shows the same rate of increase as did the first half, the importations will amount to $600,000 or $670,000 for the year. It is reported that Sears, Roebuck & Co., a large distributing house in Chicago, have recently placed abroad an order for 300,000 pairs of women's cheap shoes, shoes which take the place of those manufactured in this country. Before making the proposed reduction in the duty on shoes, Congress should give careful consideration to the views expressed by our competitors when the duty was reduced in 1908. The Boot and Shoe Trades Journal, of London, of August 27, 1909, in an editorial stated, among other things:

When we come to the higher grades our advantages are even more pronounced and our prospects more pleasing. Our 12s. 6d. and 13s. lines compare to a distinct advantage with the $4 shoe of America, whilst, in addition, we can give an English oak sole by the side of a red or union-tanned sole of American manufacture. There is no comparison in the wear or in the shape-retaining qualities of the two articles. In the cheaper-class goods, and particularly in boys' and girls' school boots, we can beat our rivals hand over fist. They have made a big mistake in reducing their duties on footwear. As we have said, not a solitary American shoe was ever sold here in consequence of its cheapness, but because of its novelty and its better fitting qualities. But our friends across the "pond" have no longer these monopolies. We have carefully copied all these good points and married them to the undoubted advantages we have always possessed, namely, better work, more durable work, and better sole leather. We have the best of their machinery, and we have some which they have not got, and, what is more, we know how to make use of our advantages. It is for these reasons that our shoes are superior and cheaper.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Did I correctly understand the gentleman to say that the amount of shoes imported from England for 1910 approximated $178,000?

Mr. WEEKS. One hundred and seventy-one thousand dollars.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Can the gentleman inform the committee, approximately, what exportations of American shoes to Great Britain took place in the same year, 1910?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes; I can do that. Mr. Chairman (after searching), I have mixed my figures so I can not find those which would furnish a reply to this inquiry, but I will say that the shipment of shoes to Great Britain from the United States decreased from 1909 to 1910.

Mr. LONGWORTH. If the gentleman will permit, I think I can give the figures. The exportations to England from this country for 1909 were $998,762 worth and in 1910, $799,453 worth, a loss of about $200,000.

Mr. WEEKS. I stated early in my remarks that the increase of shipments of shoes from this country was to Cuba, Mexico, and Canada, and the continental part of Europe, and the trade to Great Britain has fallen off.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman permit another interruption, and that is to say, that a very few years ago we had a large business with Australia.

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. And that is absolutely cut off by the duty of 30 per cent?

Mr. WEEKS. I would like to refer to that right here, to say the duty is 40 per cent, not 30. Here is something that happened in Australia within two weeks. They have a wage board in Australia, which has recently increased the rate of wages to be paid to shoe workers with this result.

I take my information from a report made by Vice Consul General Baker in Consular and Trade Reports, April 1, 1911:

AUSTRALIAN BOOT AND SHOE INDUSTRY.

With reference to the Australian boot and shoe trade, the increasing difficulty, as appears, of Australian boot and shoe manufacturers in competing with imported goods, owing to increased cost of wages, has resulted since the first of this year in one Melbourne factory, with a capacity of 5,000 pairs of boots, being closed down, while all the factories engaged in the trade are suffering and have decreased their output.

The benefit to employees from increased wages as ordered by the wages boards seems to be offset by decreased work for them to do, many men having been recently laid off. On February 1 a mass meeting of those engaged in the industry was held at Melbourne, at which it was suggested that the Government should be requested to increase the duty on imported boots and shoes to about 70 per cent. One of the leading manufacturers said at this meeting that, owing to the rise in the wages, the manufacturers had to make a slight advance in the price of footwear and that opened the door to the foreigner. They had imports in 1909 of $1,372,000 worth of shoes and in 1910 $1,747,900 worth, an increase of $375,000 in one year. They had to compete against the wages paid in England and other parts, and to meet labor conditions, which led to 26s. ($6.35) being paid for 53 hours' work. When the wages were fixed at £2 2s. ($10.22) the manufacturers paid 10d. (20 cents) per pound for their "crop." To-day they find that the commodity has gone up to 1s. 3d. (30 cents) per pound. Wages had increased from £2 ($9.73) to £2 14s. ($13.14). Several of their factories were closed and others were only working half time, and manufacturers were obliged to lose some of their best men.

Now, I want to call attention to the duties which are imposed by other countries on our footwear. In Canada the duty has recently been raised to 30 per cent; in Mexico it is from 30 cents to $1.50 a pair; in France, under the new tariff, it has been recently raised from 50 to 95 cents a pair; in Germany it is 20 per cent and averages about 25 cents a pair; in Belgium it is 27 cents a pound; in Russia it is $1 a pound; in Spain it is $1.10 a pound; in Japan it is 40 per cent; in Argentina it is 40 per cent; and so on through the list. Every country with which we are doing any considerable business imposes a tariff on our footwear, while we are proposing to give up the policy which we have been consistently following since the organization of this Government in putting our footwear and our shoemakers on a free-trade basis.

I have been asked some questions as to the reason why we have an increase in the cost of shoes in this country. Mr. Charles H. Jones, to whom I have referred several times, stated recently before a committee on the cost of living:

I have no suggestions to offer the committee as to how the American shoe can be brought to the consumer on a lower basis of price. The $3.50 shoe costs the factory approximately $2.30. Selling, office expense, and the ordinary advertising necessary in any modern business bring the cost up to at least $2.50, and frequently $2.55, leaving but a narrow margin of profit for the manufacturer, who is obliged to sell the shoe for $2.60 or less. The retailer, who pays $2.60 for a $3.50 shoe, has practically no profit at all for himself. His cost of doing business is approximately 30 per cent, so that a man's $3.50 shoe, which is naturally a leader in the hands of the average retailer, contributes nothing at all to his profit.

If this statement is correct, a man's $3.50 shoe, which is naturally a leader in the hands of the retailer, contributes nothing at all to the retailer's profits.

Mr. Jones goes on to say that the increase in the cost of these shoes is based on the increase in cost of almost everything which goes into the shoe, including the cost of the lasts, the boxes in which the shoes are shipped, the cost of selling, maintaining more drummers on the road and paying them higher wages, the cost of labor and the cost of material, an increase which necessitates the selling of what was formerly a $3.50 shoe at $4 or $4.50 a pair.

The opposition to this legislation does not come entirely from the manufacturer; it comes from labor, and especially that labor directly interested in the industry. As an indication of labor's position I quote from a letter written by John F. Tobin, general president of the Boot and Shoe Workers' Union, April 26, 1911:

The greater efficiency of labor in the shoe industry in the United States, as against any foreign country, is not sufficient to offset the lower standard of living in all foreign countries as compared with the United States, notwithstanding the cheaper labor prices which prevail in foreign countries. To put shoes and finished leather on the free list, or to in any way reduce the present tariff, would compel American shoe manufacturers to meet foreign competition through the only avenue open to them, namely, to attack the wages of the shoe workers and thereby bring about a standard of wages lower than at present exists, which would result in industrial warfare and no doubt eventually establish the lower standard of wages, consequently the lower standard of living.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Would not the same argument apply to the bill pased a few days ago, known as the Canadian reciprocity bill?

Mr. WEEKS. I want to say to the gentleman from South Dakota that I have stated, I think, three times that I am trying to discuss the shoe industry, and I am stating to him and the other members of this committee what I think that industry is entitled to. I do not say that all other industries or all other classes are getting what they are entitled to, more or less. We might agree and we might disagree as to that, but now I am trying to prove to him that the shoe industry and the shoe worker are entitled to all the protection now being given them.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Can the gentleman give the committee some information as to the condition of the shoe industry, as to how it is prospering, and whether or not it is making large profits or merely reasonable profits?

Mr. WEEKS. I can give the gentleman from South Dakota briefly some information on that subject. It is a good industry; and, like all others, perhaps to a greater extent than in most other cases, it depends on the skill of the management and the volume of the business. The probable average profit made by the best shoemakers, by Mr. Keith and others, is about 8 cents a pair. Mr. Jones and Mr. Keith have both testified recently that the average profit which they made was about 8 cents a pair. But the profit on coarse or low-priced goods is very much less than that. It is not more than about 3 or 4 cents a pair. I very much doubt if you will find any shoes on which the manufacturing profit is more than 10 cents a pair.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Can the gentleman give any information as to the probable cost on the capital invested in that line of industry?

Mr. WEEKS. I can not do it, because I have not the figures segregating the selling cost from the profit, after taking out the cost of material, the cost of labor, the cost of machinery, and the cost of salaries.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Of course, the vital thing the committee would like information upon, if we are to be informed about the industry, is what percentage he makes upon his capital.

Mr. WEEKS. I think the industry is making about 8 cents a pair on shoes.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Of course, that throws no light on whether it is profitable or not profitable.

Mr. WEEKS. It throws some light on it, because the capital invested is about $125,000,000; 8 cents a pair would be about $20,000,000. So that would indicate that the gross profit, after taking out the cost of selling, is 16 or 18 per cent; but this does not allow for the capital invested in machinery, which is leased, and it probably does not adequately cover the cost or the value of real estate, which in such an industry is usually carried at a very low figure. These charges would greatly reduce the net income.

Mr. BOWMAN. Has the gentleman considered the competition that would come from the surplus, in view of the fact that it has been stated on the floor of this House that manufactories are being established at Helsingfors, in Finland, and in other European countries, fully equipped with American machinery and supplied with American lasts, so that in case of depression in trade, when they would carry large stocks of goods, those stocks might be thrown in here, and thus demoralize the business of this country?

Mr. WEEKS. I have not referred to that because I have not had time to, but I will say that that is an element which ought to be considered. If you are going to remove the duty from shoes, we will become the dumping ground of the surplus of all the manufacturing establishments of the world. Whenever they have a surplus on hand, they will dump that surplus into this country at whatever price they can get.

That is a question frequently discussed here, whether American manufacturers are justified in selling abroad lower than the normal price at home. That is frequently done by the manufacturers of all countries. It is done because by so doing the manufacturer can maintain his establishment at the highest state of efficiency, can keep his labor employed all the time, and it enables him to sell closer than would be the case if he were obliged to run, making a reduced output. Many industries are not profitably run at 75 per cent of their full capacity, when they would be very profitably run at full capacity, even if the output were sold in both cases at the same price.

Mr. SIMS. As an illustration, I can suggest to the gentleman a case that all will appreciate. When the Payne-Aldrich bill was enacted, taking the duty off hides, putting hides on the free list, and reducing the duties on shoes and leather, it was predicted that the price of shoes would go down. Now, I use the Stacey-Adams shoe, and have worn that make of shoes for a number of years, and a few months after the Payne-Aldrich tariff went into effect I went down town to the shoe store that I patronize to get a pair of those shoes and the firm charged me more for a pair of the same shoes than before. The price was higher than when the Payne bill was passed, and this gentleman told me they had not increased their profit at all, but that the shoes cost them more.

Mr. WEEKS. I have spoken of that, and I have gone into some detail to show why shoes are now costing more than they cost five years ago. But I want to ask the gentleman if he is sure he got a Stacey-Adams shoe?

Mr. SIMS. Yes. I have got them on now, and they are subject to the gentleman's inspection. [Laughter.] They said they would either have to increase the price of the shoes or reduce the quality of the material that entered into their manufacture, and they had chosen the former.

Mr. WEEKS. The gentleman should always be sure that he sees the stamp of the manufacturer on the shoe, then he will be likely to get a better article.

Mr. SIMS. I have worn that kind of shoe for 14 years.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. I will suggest to the gentleman that he might have bought the shoes from different retailers, and that point should be taken into consideration when commenting on a difference in price.

Mr. WEEKS. Gentlemen on the other side have repeatedly said during this debate that it was up to this side of the House to show why these duties ought not to be removed—why shoes should not be put on the free list, for instance. This is a great industry, employing a large capital and nearly 175,000 persons; some substantial reason should be advanced why a change should be made rather than propose the change and ask those interested in the industry or believers in the protective policy to prove that it is unwise. It would be just as logical for the Government to arrest a man and say to him, "Unless you can prove that throughout your entire life you have been innocent, you are guilty." The obvious method of procedure would have been for the Ways and Means Committee to have given shoe manufacturers and shoe workers a chance to answer this question and to show why the change should not be made. Instead of that, the majority has proceeded without any consideration, has agreed in a caucus to support the bill, without amendment, and it is impossible to believe that this attempt at legislation is not mere buncombe, intended to delude those in whose benefit it is supposed to be passed, if, indeed, it is passed at all. It is not information the other side wants; it is material to use in a coming political campaign; so if the evidence which I have tried to submit, bearing on this question, assists in showing the folly of proceeding in such a manner as has the majority in this case, I shall not consider the time wasted, although I have taken much more of the time of the committee than I intended. [Prolonged applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Chairman, when the Canadian reciprocity bill was before the House I voted for it, not because I thought it entirely satisfactory, but because I thought it was the beginning of a good work—a first step in the right direction—and I felt that when the Representatives of the people had once put their hands to the plow they would not turn back, and that they would surely take additional steps in the same direction.

Many of the ablest advocates of a tariff for protection were wise enough to see the true meaning of it and frank enough to admit that their opposition to it was largely on the ground that it was an assault on the system of protection, and, so believing, they fought it with every weapon available.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] well expressed their views when he said that the reciprocity bill "was an abandonment of the protective policy."

The same thought is expressed in the report of the minority members of the Ways and Means Committee. They say:

> If this bill becomes a law it will mark the downfall of the protective system.

Other eminent gentlemen on the floor of the House, distinguished for their devotion to protection, have given expression to similar sentiments. These gentlemen did not, however, make their fight against the bill on that line.

Their arguments were not a direct defense of the policy of protection, which they admit this bill puts in jeopardy. They attempted, rather, to base their defense on the theory that the bill is an attack on the farmers of America, and they appealed to the agricultural interests and sought to enlist them on their side. Scarcely a word was said during the debate in defense of the American lumber interests, although the bill would undoubtedly reduce the price of lumber. Not a word was heard in defense of the Paper Trust, although, beyond question, its monopoly would be injured, if not destroyed, should the bill become a law. Other big interests which were involved had no open defenders on the floor, and the whole plan of defense seemed to be based on the supposed injury which would result to the American farmer. Why this silence as to the other interests? Why were there no voices raised bewailing the loss to the Paper Trust or the lumber barons? And why such sudden solicitude for the farmers? Is it unreasonable to conclude that their volunteer defenders were trying to make a rampart of the farmers from behind which they might defend other interests that have been plundering the people far too long? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Some light is shed on the matter by Circular No. 271, sent out in opposition to the reciprocity bill by Mr. Wakeman, secretary and treasurer of the American Protective Tariff League. I quote the latter part of it. Speaking of the reciprocity bill, he says:

> It aims at a reduction of prices of such "necessaries" of life as the farmer has to sell, but provides for no reduction of prices for the "necessaries" the farmer has to buy.
> Protection can not endure upon a basis so entirely unjust and unfair. It must be for all, or it will be for none.
> Once the American farmer finds that protection is not for him, the end of protection will quickly come.
> Ten million votes are cast by American farmers. Kindly write or wire your Senator or Representative in Congress in opposition to the treaty.
> We inclose copy of Words of Good Cheer, giving the names of all Senators and Representatives who should be addressed in this connection.
> Very truly, yours, W. F. WAKEMAN, > Treasurer and General Secretary.
> NEW YORK, February 6, 1911.

One of his objections, you will notice, is that the bill provides no reduction of prices—that is, no reduction of tariff—on what the farmer has to buy. Well, he can rest easy, for we are now ready to correct that defect and reduce the price of what he has to buy, and I hope Mr. Wakeman will be satisfied. He lets the cat out of the bag, however, when he tells us that "10,000,000 votes are cast by the American farmers," and that "once the American farmer finds that protection is not for him, the end of protection will quickly come."

Evidently the secretary of the Protective Tariff League looks on the farmer as a convenience, and the inference that some other advocates of protection take a similar view is not a violent one.

One would think, from the arguments of those opposed to the reciprocity bill, that the protective system had been originally devised, and is still maintained, for the sole and especial benefit of the farmers. I want to enter my emphatic dissent from such a view, and to assert that, on the contrary, this unfair and unreasonable system of levying and collecting taxes from the people for the benefit of favored classes has steadily robbed the farmer, and it would be a great blessing for him should Congress wipe out the whole protective system. Of course it would not be the part of practical wisdom to wipe it out at one stroke. We have had it with us so long that we have grown accustomed to it; our business transactions are based upon it; we have had to buy and sell with reference to it. During the 50 years it has been in existence it has become ingrained and interwoven in our business affairs to such an extent that it is now a fact, a condition, which, as sensible men, we must recognize. And we must deal with it in such a way as to create the least practical amount of business disturbance. There is a law of inertia in business as well as in physics, and we are bound to recognize that law and not move with undue haste, even in a good cause.

I remember reading somewhere that the girls employed in the arsenic mills in Austria-Hungary eat small quantities of that drug, because it gives to their complexions a delicate and much-desired tint. Little by little they increase the amount taken until, after long use, they are able to take with impunity a quantity that would kill an ordinary individual not accustomed to it. Of course the habit, if persisted in, finally causes death. But the strange thing about it is that if the victim suddenly ceases to use it she becomes violently ill and exhibits all the symptoms of arsenic poisoning. Hence to effect a cure of the habit the quantity taken must be gradually reduced until it can be finally dropped altogether. As it is with the arsenic eaters, so it is with our protected industries.

After the protection habit was formed it was necessary to keep increasing the dose, the recipients of the plunder always finding a pretext for the increase. First, they said that our infant industries needed wet nursing. Then they said we had to protect American labor from competition with the pauper labor of Europe. Then they insisted on protection for the American farmer. He must be protected, forsooth, by preventing the importation of articles which he is constantly exporting and selling in the open markets of the world and in competition with all the world. And, finally, they said we must have protection to guarantee the manufacturer a reasonable profit on his business. Having been practically driven from all these positions, they are now resorting to the familiar device of an armistice in order to gain time for the invention of some new pretext. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Their proposition is to create a tariff commission, which is to perform the impracticable, if not impossible, feat of ascertaining the difference in the actual cost of producing manufactured articles at home and abroad. In this they doubtless console themselves with the hope that the commission will not make a report until they can discover some new sophism with which to deceive the people into the belief that they can increase their prosperity by taxing themselves; and I am inclined to think they would not regret it much if the commission did not report till Gabriel was about ready to sound a blast on that historic trumpet. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.]

The advocates of protection are both shrewd and able. Persistent opposition has driven them together, has welded them into a solid and homogeneous mass, where they have been unitedly working, each for all, and all for each. They realized the force of Franklin's remark, and they have learned to hang together to keep from hanging separately.

In its earlier days its advocates justified protection on the ground that capital paid better in agricultural pursuits than in manufacturing, and they insisted that it was the duty of the Government to so frame the laws as to enable the manufacturers to make the price of their goods artificially high, so as to induce capital to leave the farms and go into manufacturing enterprises.

The raising of revenue from duties on imports is and has been practiced by all Governments, and is legitimate, because the money so collected is used for public purposes, and these duties are frequently levied on such articles, and in such a way, as to partially shield the home manufacturer of them from competition, thus giving him a limited and incidental advantage. But the theory of protection goes much further than this. It calls for the erection of practically impassible barriers against the wares of foreign manufacturers, leaving the American consumer entirely at the mercy of the American manufacturer. This stage of protection was reached only by slow degrees. Before the Civil War our tariffs were comparatively low, but the necessity for revenue during that struggle demanded an increase in customhouse taxes, and these taxes added to the foreign cost resulted in prices so high as to greatly stimulate investments in manufacturing enterprises.

Having tasted of the sweets of high prices and big profits those who enjoyed them were not satisfied to give them up when the war was over. But as the Government's need of money grew less, and it was proposed to reduce the customhouse taxes, those who enjoyed the benefit of war prices had to devise some new reason for the continuance of a high-tariff policy. Then it was they raised a cry for the necessity of protecting our infant industries, and they succeeded in getting the people to credit them. But the infant grew to adult size, became a great big, overgrown, selfish mollycoddle, who seemed to think consumers were created for his especial benefit. He bawled as if he were being crucified if a boy half his size made a face at him, and he had an attack of hysteria if asked to enter into any kind of competition. He wanted pap, and then more pap, all the time, and he wanted it brought to him at that, and because he never had to exert his strength he did not really know what he was capable of and lived in constant fear. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] told us the other day that the fear of the Wilson bill brought on a business panic nearly two years before the bill passed.

If the gentleman was right, it proves how timid and hysterical and brash those industries are which rest on protection. Of course I do not agree with the gentleman as to the fact. I think protection has borne two legitimate children. It is, as Mr. Havemeyer said, the legitimate mother of trusts, and it is also the legitimate mother of panics. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I might concede that there was a time when protection stimulated manufacturing enterprises, but stimulation, when excessive, is always followed, first by exhilaration and then by depression and prostration, and these panics are but "the cold, gray dawn of the morning after." [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

The "infant-industries" theory finally grew to be a national joke and had to be abandoned. A new watchword had to be found, and the infant was pushed behind the curtain, where he was kept temporarily out of sight but by no means out of mind. Its beneficiaries then insisted that protection was not for the benefit of the infant prodigy at all; that the real purpose of it had always been to protect the American laboring man against competition with the pauper labor of Europe. "We can not bear it," said the beneficiaries of protection at election time; "it makes our hearts bleed to see the American laboring men competing with the pauper labor of Europe." And the laboring men heard them and believed; and on this cry, aided by unpatriotic appeals to passions engendered during the Civil War, protection again triumphed at the polls. But when the workingman, after the victory, insisted on getting his share of the protection pap in the form of higher wages, he was coldly ignored. Protection emissaries went to Europe and brought what they had been calling "pauper labor" right to the door of the American workingman to compete with him at close range and thus keep wages down, regardless of campaign promises. The workingman soon saw that if his wages were to be increased he must attend to the matter himself. He then went to work organizing labor unions, and in that work he had to overcome bitter opposition from those protected interests which pretended such solicitude for his welfare. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Another and a favorite argument of the protection advocates has been that by making the price of the manufactured articles high capital would be induced to invest in manufacturing industries; that then men with money to spare would invest it in manufacturing; that this would make competition keen, and thus bring about lower prices. Thus we were told that the protection policy might at first mean high prices, but that it would eventually make low prices by means of this competition. You may believe, if you can, that the party of protection really favored a policy because it would result in low prices for their wares. I must be shown. I am from near Missouri. [Laughter.]

That they were not sincere in it is fairly well indicated by their last platform declaration, which proposes to make the American people guarantee reasonable profits to the manufacturers, and that, too, regardless of the conditions ordinarily required to secure success in business; and leaving it entirely to the interested party to judge his own case and determine what is a reasonable profit. Do you imagine the beneficiaries of such a platform declaration when enacted into law would permit their modesty to interfere with their profits?

I would not assert that when they were urging the theory that lower prices would be reached through the protection policy they foresaw what did actually happen, but I will say that I think they did not really want low prices for their wares, and that they may have seen, and probably did see, that some way would be found to prevent the advent of low prices and only reasonable profits.

We now know that the promise, whether sincerely made or not, proved vain and empty. When the time came for the low prices through competition, those who made the promises organized trusts and other combinations to prevent the performance of their own promises. Protection prevented competition from without, and there could be little or none from within, new manufacturing enterprises being practically impossible, as no one would have the temerity to start a new business concern in the face of trust opposition, which would surely destroy his business by underselling well knowing that when it was destroyed they would get their money back from the customers by overcharging.

It is scarcely necessary now to call attention to another catch phrase long urged by the protectionists, namely, that the foreigner pays the tariff tax. I mention it, not to refute it—that would be waste of time—but rather to show their ingenuity, to show how prolific they have been in the invention of deceptive phrases. Driven from one position to another, I indulge the hope that they reached their last ditch when they proclaimed that the law should guarantee a reasonable profit to the manufacturer. No conditions are imposed, no qualifications provided. The investment may have been a foolish one; the machinery may be out of date, the business may be mismanaged, the capital stock may be inflated; 50, or 100, or even 200 per cent of water may have been pumped into the stock, as appears to have been done in the case of the Steel Trust, but still, according to the platform promise, the concern is entitled to a reasonable profit, and the interested parties are to decide what constitutes such a profit. Such a platform promise was at least well calculated to make the beneficiaries of protection open up their hearts and purses to those who made the promise, nor could they forget that past legislative performances justified them in accepting the offer at its face value. Surely those who made the promise must have been in great need of something with which those to whom they made it could supply them.

In the not very remote past it is generally believed that they contributed to the campaign funds of the protection party sums which could not have been expended legitimately, and they doubtless did it in the belief that the party would later on confer further legislative favors which would enable them to reimburse themselves from the general public, with liberal interest.

But the people disapproved of their policies and practices last November, and declared in favor of a real revision of the tariff downward, and they gave the Democrats a commission to make the necessary reductions.

I realize that the execution of that commission is a serious task. It is like a difficult but necessary surgical operation; it has to be done, but no matter how skillfully it is done it will hurt. In attacking intrenched privilege and wrong those making the attack must begin not where they would, but where they can. The necessity for beginning somewhere has been recognized by President Taft, who is a protectionist, and by many other prominent Republicans who are also protectionists. They prepared and proposed the Canadian reciprocity measure, and we carried it through the House. Again I say I think it is lame and insufficient if we stop with it. But why should we stop with it?

This first short step was proposed by a Republican President and supported by many Republican Representatives, and, little as it is, we Democrats would, in the face of our former declarations, be guilty of insincerity and political cowardice had we refused to take it. Having already taken it, we are now about to make further progress, to take the next step, and pass the Farmers' Free-List Bill.

I am not one of those who think that other and additional steps toward tariff reform will be prevented by another branch of the Congress or by the President. I assume that they will do their duty in the premises and join with us in giving the people the relief which they demand and need so much. But if they do prevent progress in that direction, they will surely have to answer to the people for it.

I feel reasonably sure that the President and those Republicans who voted for reciprocity are too wise and too clear-sighted not to see that a corresponding reduction of the more oppressive schedules is absolutely necessary for the relief of the public in general and of the farmers in particular.

Such revision could be made without particular disturbance or shock to business if certain professional protectionist calamity howlers would cease trying to save the protection graft by predicting all sorts of disasters in case any of it is taken from them. So good a protectionist as the editor of the Iron Age admits this to be true. He said, editorially, on December 22, 1910:

> The country generally has not felt seriously alarmed over the possibility that some of the schedules might be taken up separately and lower duties named on articles therein classified. This is a matter which was not thought to be specially disturbing, although it would, of course, retard trade for a time in the commodities on which new duties were under consideration.

And, again, he says:

> No general tariff revision is desired by the great majority of the people. The revision of a very few schedules of the present tariff is all that should be attempted.

You see, he admits that some schedules should be revised. And then he adds:

> The country imperatively needs a rest from governmental interference with business.

He wants "a rest from governmental interference"! Now, what do you think of that? The Government for 40 years has been legislating in the interest of a class. It has compelled and is still compelling millions of its citizens, through protection legislation, to pay tribute to that small class which the Iron Age represents. And look at the results.

We boast of our great national wealth, now rated at $125,000,000,000. Where is this wealth? Who has it? The great bulk of it has been gathered into comparatively few hands, and largely through tariff laws which, in my judgment, have prostituted the taxing power of the Government, by using it to make millions of our citizens pay tribute to a favored few.

This is well illustrated by a condition in the line of business which the Iron Age represents.

It is said when the 24 directors of the Steel Trust sit down to their table the owners of one-twelfth of the wealth of the United States occupy the chairs. This is further illustrated by the fact that 1 per cent of the American people own more property than the other 99 per cent, while five and one-half million American families, or 44 per cent of our people, own an average of only $150 per family.

The protection laws which are largely responsible for these conditions are still in force. The people still suffer from them.

But the Iron Age thinks we tamper with these laws too much, and that the country needs a rest; which, I suppose, means that the victims of protection should not grumble while the favored class is collecting its tribute from them. How kind and how good of the Iron Age. Speaking for that favored class he says, in effect, "All we want is to be let alone"; but in the meantime, like the daughter of the horseleech, they keep on crying "give, give." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But how about the victims? Do you not think they would be willing to put up with a little temporary inconvenience in order to be permanently relieved of a burden which has become well-nigh intolerable?

Of all those who have suffered from tariff exactions none have suffered more than the farmers. None have given more or gotten less through protection than they have. It is said by gentlemen that putting agricultural implements on the free list will not give them any relief; that they can now buy agricultural implements cheaper than they can be bought in any other country. That argument, as the poet said of vaulting ambition—

O'erleaps itself and falls on the other side.

If they can buy such implements cheaper here than anywhere else, what objection can there be to putting agricultural implements on the free list? But can they buy them cheaper here? I think the evidence is the other way. The manufacturers admitted a few years ago that they were selling their goods cheaper abroad than at home, and explained by saying they did so in order to keep their employees at work. I am glad that I can admit the fact without being compelled to accept their explanation of it. I prefer to take the view expressed by the late Mr. John Hay, Secretary of State. In an address made not long before his death, he said:

We are building locomotives for railways in Europe, Asia, and Africa. Our bridges can be built in America, ferried across the Atlantic, transported up the Nile, and flung across a river in the Sudan in less time than any European nation, with a start of 4,000 miles, can do the work. We sell ironware in Birmingham, carpets in Kiderminster; we pipe sewers of Scotch cities; our bicycles distance all competitors on the Continent; Ohio sends watch cases to Geneva. All this is of advantage to all parties; there is no sentiment in it. They buy our wares because we make them better and at lower cost than other people.

According to him, they did sell abroad cheaper than at home. They could not compel foreigners to pay such exorbitant prices as our protection laws enabled them to exact from the home folk.

Mr. Bridgman, in his book, The Passing of the Tariff, published in 1909, says:

The policy of underselling to foreigners has become a recognized practice on the part of the protected manufacturers of the United States, secret if possible, but followed constantly, whether secret or open.

Dr. Charles W. Elliott, late of Harvard, in an address made in September, 1908, said:

That the tariff is not necessary to the maintenance of American wages or American standards of living appears clearly from the common practice of selling American goods in foreign countries at much lower prices than they are sold in the United States, and yet at a profit.

And he significantly adds:

If the American people mean to maintain their individual liberty in industries, trades, commerce, and politics, they must steadily defend themselves against monopolies.

At its meeting in Hartford, Conn., in November, 1907, the National Grange passed a series of resolutions condemning American manufacturers for selling their goods cheaper in foreign countries than at home, at the expense of American agriculture, and recommending that every article so sold be put upon the free list.

There is scarcely a limit to the evidence which could be collected to show that gentlemen were in error in asserting that the American farmers got their implements cheaper than those of any other country, but I will content myself with adding a list of the home and foreign prices of American-made articles in common use, in all of which the farmer is interested:

Article.	Home price.	Price sold at abroad.
Cultivators	$11.00	$8.40
Plows	14.00	12.60
Axes, dozen	8.25	7.20
Kettles	1.40	.85
Table knives, gross	15.00	12.00
Horseshoe nails	3.00	[1] 2.00
Barbed wire	3.00	[1] 2.00
Cut rivets	10.00	[1] 5.55
Typewriters	100.00	60.00
Sewing machines:
Fine	27.50	20.75
Medium	22.00	17.50
Cheap	18.00	12.00
Steel rails	28.00	[2] 23.00

[1] Per hundredweight. [2] Per long ton.

Our protection friends are great admirers of that form of sophism known as "the false cause."

When two things which might be related are found together, this method of reasoning assumes that they bear the relation of cause and effect. We have a high protective tariff, this alleged argument runs, and our farmers are prosperous, hence the high tariff caused their prosperity. Or this: We have protection and we have high wages, hence protection makes wages high. By a parity of reasoning I might say they have cyclones in Kansas; the farmers of Kansas are prosperous, hence cyclones cause prosperity. Or thus: We have a great many schools and churches in this country; we also have a great many divorces, hence the schools and churches are the cause of the divorces. And all of these arguments are equally sound, which means they are all unsound.

Mr. CONNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. GRAHAM. I do.

Mr. CONNELL. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois if this is not a good place in his speech to elucidate a fact that the gentlemen on the other side of the aisle have evidently forgotten, a very important argument in bringing their case forward, which is that there is six weeks' delay in the coming of spring here in the District of Columbia, which may be figured as being due to this Democratic Congress?

Mr. GRAHAM. It is the tariff agitation here, of course, which did it. There can be no other adequate reason for it. [Laughter.] According to the logic of the protectionists, the two things being found together must bear the relation of cause and effect. [Laughter.]

Our prosperity is due to other causes than high tariff. The prosperity of the farmer, when he is prosperous, is largely due to the quantity of fertile land in this country adapted to the use of the best farming methods. The farms of the West average 386 acres. In France they average less than 20 acres. Our land in the West at least is comparatively new, and very fertile, and if the farmer has accumulated a little wealth it is largely due to the fact that increasing population has added to the value of his land. Cheap, fertile land and plenty of it has been the principal cause of our great growth, aided by the profuse abundance of mineral wealth of every kind which the God of the universe, and not the protective tariff, placed in the bowels of the continent. Every condition which makes for prosperity in agriculture is here. Climate, soil, variety of production, and facility for transportation; in short, nature seems to have exhausted herself in giving us every material advantage.

People from Europe came here in myriads because of these natural advantages. They came when we had low tariff, and they would have come just the same if we had no tariff, and their coming helped to develop our great agricultural resources. Many of them lived in tariff-ridden countries, and if protection is such a wizard in making prosperity, why did they have to leave the homes of their childhood to come to a strange land? It was not the fact of protection here that brought many of them, for many of them left that behind them, and many came when we did not have high protective tariffs.

The fact is that no decade in our history shows such material progress as the 10 years from 1850 to 1860 under the Walker tariff—a purely revenue measure.

Our national wealth during that decade increased 126 per cent, an increase far beyond that of any similar length of time.

The following figures contrast that decade with the one from 1890 to 1900, much to the disadvantage of the latter:

	1850 to 1860.	1890 to 1900.
	Per cent.	Per cent.
Our national wealth increased	126.0	36.0
Products of manufactories increased	85.1	38.9
Capital invested in manufacturing increased	89.4	50.7
Railroad mileage increased	300.0	19.0

This remarkable progress, made during a decade when we had what protectionists, with ridiculous inconsistency, call a free-trade tariff, is a forceful and eloquent answer to the claim that protection is the cause of prosperity, except, of course, in the sense that protection has made favored individuals prosperous by affecting the distribution of wealth in such a way as to multiply millionaires at one end of the industrial scale and paupers at the other end of it.

The claim that protection is the cause of the high wages paid here is equally unfounded.

Primarily, wages should be an equitable share of what labor produces. What the labor of anyone will produce depends, first, on the efficiency of the individual and, second, on the conditions under which the labor is performed. Any comparison of wages in different countries, or in different communities in the same country, which ignores these two fundamental conditions is necessarily, and I might almost add willfully, misleading. And yet while our protectionist friends never cease calling attention to the fact that we pay higher wages than are paid in other countries, they never once allude to either of these fundamental facts. They never tell that labor is more efficient here and that the conditions here are more favorable to labor, the environment better than elsewhere, and yet it is largely because of these facts that wages are higher here than abroad, and because of these facts wages have always been higher here. Whether we had high tariff or low tariff, wages were higher here; and if we had no tariff at all, wages would still be higher here because of the greater efficiency of the American laborer and the better conditions under which that labor is performed.

The position of the protectionists on this question of wages is singularly absurd and leads them into the most illogical positions. This is well illustrated in a speech made by one of my Republican colleagues from Illinois during the consideration of the Payne tariff bill and reiterated in his argument yesterday. Here is a table of wages he gave showing the day wage paid in certain industries in this country and also in Great Britain, Germany, France, and Belgium. He made the usual protection argument in connection with that table. He said:

I do not want to live to see the day when the American workingman will be forced by legislation to accept the low wage scale of foreign free-trade nations. If there be those here who think that there is no substantial difference between the wages received by our laborers and the wages received by foreign laborers, I would respectfully invite their careful inspection of the following comparison of wages in this country and the wages paid in free-trade Europe:

	United States.		Great Britain.		Germany.		France.		Belgium.
	Hour.	Day.	Hour.	Day.	Hour.	Day.	Hour.	Day.	Hour.	Day.
Bricklayers	$0.55	$4.40	$0.21	$1.68	$0.13	$1.04	$0.13	$1.04	$0.08	$0.64
Stonecutters	.42	3.30	.20	1.60	.12	.96	.14	1.12	.07	.56
Stonemasons	.46	3.68	.21	1.68	.13	1.04	.14	1.12	.08	.64
Hod carriers	.29	2.32	.13	1.04	.08	.64	.10	.80	No data.
Carpenters	.36	2.88	.20	1.60	.13	1.04	.15	1.20	.07	.56
Painters	.35	2.80	.18	1.44	.12	.96	.13	1.04	.07	.56
Plumbers	.44	3.52	.20	1.60	.11	.88	.15	1.20	.08	.64
Machinists	.27	2.16	.17	1.36	.13	1.04	.13	1.04	No data.
General laborers	.17	1.36	.10	.80	.08	.64	.10	.80	.05	.40

Not a word said about what the laborer accomplished in a day; not a word about the conditions or environment; not a word about the fact that in the United States we have less than 30 persons to the square mile, while Belgium, one of the countries compared, has 622 persons to the square mile, that Germany has 305 to the square mile, and that Great Britain has 347. How ridiculously absurd, to compare wages and conditions in two countries, when the population is 20 times as dense in one as in the other and competition proportionally keen.

But let us examine this table which is supposed to prove the case for protection and see what it shows. In the first two columns it appears that the American laborer gets about twice as much daily wages as the British laborer does. With the usual ostrich logic of protection it is assumed that that proves the case. Evidently there are none so blind as those who will not see. How very strange that my colleague and his protectionist associates could not see the real meaning of the figures he quotes.

His statistics show that protected Germany and protected France pay bricklayers 13 cents an hour. Protected Belgium pays 8 cents an hour, and free-trade England pays hers 21 cents an hour. And this proportion holds good throughout his table. The figures show, then, that free-trade England pays almost twice as large a daily wage as protected France or Germany and about two and a half times as much as protected Belgium. And this comparison is between countries where the conditions are nearly similar. According to my colleague's logic, the conclusion is inevitable that free trade means high wages and that protection makes low wages. Add to this the fact that German workmen migrate to free-trade England, but no Englishmen go to protected Germany, and according to protection logic, the case is proved.

Of course, the truth is, as I have already said, that wages are regulated, primarily, by what the labor produces, modified, of course, by the law of competition, and that the law of competition is in turn modified by labor organizations, which largely control it.

In Belgium, with 622 persons to the square mile, the struggle for existence is a hard one, and competition is keen. In the United States, with only 30 persons to the square mile, the struggle is less hard, competition is less keen, and labor has more to work on and draw from.

The question of efficiency is an important element in the amount of wages paid, and the misleading nature of reference to the daily wage as a basis of comparison without reference to efficiency is well shown by the statement of Mr. J. H. Bailey, of the Broderick & Bascom Wire Rope Co., of St. Louis, to the Ways and Means Committee on November 28, 1908. After giving the daily wages of British workers, he says:

The wages paid for similar services in the United States is doubtless considerably more than stated above, but to compensate for this difference in wages it must be borne in mind that in England one man attends to but 1 thick-wire block; in the United States 1 man attends to at least 4, and often 6, thick-wire blocks, while for the finer sizes, say Nos. 24 to 36, there is still a greater difference. For these sizes in England 1 man attends to 10 to 15 blocks; in the United States 1 man, with the help of a boy, attends to 30 to 50 blocks.

From the foregoing it will appear that while the individual earnings of the American workman is greater than that of the English workman, still the cost per hundredweight in wages is greater to the English manufacturer because of the greater amount of work turned out by the American workman, due to the greater number of machines attended to by the American.

Mr. Andrew Carnegie stated before the same committee that the general rule is that the highest-paid labor produces the cheaper products.

Senator GALLINGER, of New Hampshire, in a speech on the floor of the Senate June 25, 1902, said:

As regards the power of production, Mulhall has shown that a farm hand in the United States does as much as 2 in the United Kingdom, 3 in Germany, 5 in Austria, and 7 in Russia. It takes 4½ Europeans to equal one American.

And, again, he says:

This comparison is emphasized by our coal consumption and steam power and finally by our products of manufacture.

If the tariff regulated the amount of wages, then England, having no tariff, would pay the lowest wage of any country, but the table cited by my colleague shows—what, indeed, we all know—that the contrary is the fact, and that England, which on their theory should pay the lowest, in fact pays the highest, and much the highest, daily wage paid in any European country.

If their theory was correct the daily wage would be the same wherever the same tariff rate prevailed.

But we know that this is not true, and that the daily wage differs as much in different parts of our own country as it does in entirely different countries.

Carroll D. Wright, who was one of the foremost statisticians of his day, estimated the cost of living in this country and the various countries of Europe, and he measured it, not by money, but by days' earnings.

He concluded that the number of working days required to cover the cost of food, clothing, lighting, heating, and taxes for an average family are, in—

	Days.
England	205
United States	225
France	231
Germany	240
Russia	286

Speaking generally, according to this table, so far as Europe is concerned, the higher the tariff the lower the wages. But in spite of all this, in spite of the fact that wages were higher here, regardless of tariffs; in spite of the fact that wages have doubled in England since they abolished tariffs; in spite of reason and experience; in spite of everything, the protectionist will raise his voice and say, "Our high protective tariff is the cause of our high wages." A friend of mine insists that a man can make the most absurd statement, and if he will repeat it loud enough and often enough, after a while he will really think it is so. The protectionists make me think my friend is right. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

It is a most significant fact that in spite of the great increase and vast amount of our national wealth, of the twelve million and a half of families in the United States, according to the census of 1900, five million and a half of these families were practically propertyless, according to the late Charles B. Spahr, then associate editor of the Outlook. He estimated that those five million and a half of families had an average of only $150 a family, consisting of clothing and household goods. He further stated that 125,000 families owned more wealth than the other 12,375,000 families, in other words 1 per cent owned more wealth than the other 99 per cent.

This is an unhealthy condition and will result in mischief if continued.

It was fashionable a few years ago to denounce those who called attention to this condition and brand them as disturbers, but that stage has been passed, thanks to the great independent press and magazines.

How foolish to ignore this condition, and how foolish to denounce those who point it out and emphasize it.

How foolish of the patient to abuse the physician who demonstrates that a cancer is forming in a vital part of his body. How much wiser it would be to thank him and set about getting cured while there was yet time.

But what has protection to do with this condition of congested or concentrated wealth?

Let me illustrate, and in doing so make clear the difference between a tariff for revenue and a tariff for protection.

Mr. Schwab, in 1899, while he was president of the Steel Trust, made a statement in writing and afterwards testified that the statement was true. In it he said:

I know positively that England can not produce pig iron at actual cost for less than $11.50 per ton, even allowing no profit on raw materials; and can not put pig iron into rails, with their most efficient works, for less than $7.50 per ton. This would make rails a net cost to them of $19. We can sell at this price and ship abroad, so as to net us $16 at works for foreign business, nearly as good as home business has been. What is true of rails is equally true of other steel products. As a result of this we are going to control the steel business of the world.

You know we can make rails for less than $12 per ton, leaving a nice margin on foreign business. Besides this foreign costs are going to increase year by year, because they have not the raw materials, while ours is going to decrease. The result of all this is that we will be able to sell our surplus abroad, run our works full all the time, and get the best practice and cost in this way.

Mr. Schwab here tells us they could make steel rails in Pittsburg at less than $12 a ton and that the same kind of rails could not be made in England for less than $19 per ton. But while they could make steel rails at $12 per ton, and by selling them at $15 make 25 per cent profit, yet they actually sold them at $28 a ton f. o. b. at Pittsburg. Had there been no tariff at all on them, you see, few or none could come from England. Allow $3 per ton for getting the English rails to the seaboard, loading them on the ship, paying the freight and insurance charges to New York, and, without any profit whatever, they would have cost $22 when they reached the customhouse there. The duty on steel rails under the Dingley law was $7.84 per ton, which, added to the other items, makes a total cost of $29.40 a ton this side the customhouse in New York.

If an American purchaser bought rails in England, of course he paid the customhouse duty or tariff of $7.84 to the collector of customs, and the money thus paid went into the Government Treasury as revenue, to be used in defraying the public expenses. But the Steel Trust was perfectly aware of what the foreign rails would cost an American purchaser, and to prevent importation they fixed the price of rails at Pittsburg at $28 a ton, or $1.40 below the foreigner's price, even if he sold at actual cost. This gave the American manufacturer a profit of $16 per ton, or 133⅓ per cent.

You will notice that he did not add the whole of the tariff. If he did the price would have been $29.40, and then there might be some importation. But by remitting $1.40 and adding only $6 of the tariff to his price, he had a monopoly of the business.

Now, where did the $6 per ton, which the tariff law enabled him to add to the price, go? Did any of it go to the Government as revenue? No indeed, not a cent. It all went into the treasury of the Steel Trust as bounty or protection.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. GRAHAM. My time is nearly up, but if the gentleman will get it extended, I will be glad to answer his question, if I can.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. Does the gentleman know what this country paid for steel rails at the time we did not make any in this country?

Mr. GRAHAM. The gentleman does, and I am glad you asked that question. The gentleman knows well, but he knows that at that time the processes that have since been invented for making steel rails were practically unknown, and the gentleman knows that most of those processes were developed by Americans. [Applause.] The gentleman knows that in the last 10 years there were 650,123 patents granted in the United States, whereas in England, in all time, there were only 278,000, and in Spain 22,000. This shows the comparative ingenuity of the peoples.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. The gentleman has not answered my question. Does the gentleman know what the United States paid England for steel rails before we made them in America?

Mr. GRAHAM. The gentleman said he did, and he does.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. But has the gentleman answered the question?

Mr. GRAHAM. The gentleman is glad to answer it. I concede, as I said awhile ago, when the gentleman from Oklahoma probably was not here, that protection stimulates, but stimulation is usually followed by prostration; and, in order to prevent that, when stimulation had reached the point where the American manufacturer had the market to himself, he then went to work and organized what we now call trusts to keep the price up, instead of putting it down, as it was said he would do.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman tell us what we paid England for steel rails prior to the time they were manufactured in America?

Mr. GRAHAM. Just about what Englishmen had to pay for steel rails. They were as high as $150 a ton, and the processes that cheapened them have been largely the result of American brains; and if there is any reason why the protection barons of this country should have the benefit of all inventions made by American brains, I do not know what the reason is. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I think when there are great inventions like Whitney's or Watt's, or any others, the people should have some of the benefits of them and not give it all to a few who are piling up millions, so that to-day they own a large part of the wealth of the country and have been practically running the Government, and not running it in the interest of the people, but in their own interest.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman permit another question?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. I do not know whether I quite understood the gentleman or not; but if I did, did I understand him to say that prior to the time when we made any steel rails in America we paid England as high as $150 a ton for steel rails?

Mr. GRAHAM. Please talk faster; the clock keeps moving.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. I beg the gentleman's pardon. Did I understand the gentleman correctly?

Mr. GRAHAM. I really do not understand why the gentleman repeats his question. I thought I made it as plain as I could make it.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. Simply to see if I misunderstood the gentleman.

Mr. GRAHAM. I am not responsible for the gentleman's understanding. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. I do not know that I misunderstood the gentleman. I just want to get him to tell me.

Mr. GRAHAM. I said very clearly that at one time rails cost $150 a ton; that at that time the present processes of making steel were unknown. It was done by hand, by hammering and heating and cooling, and there was a great deal of expense to it which is now obviated by a very simple process.

The Bessemer process had scarcely been in vogue till 1870. The price in England was then $50 a ton. In 1873 the prices there went down to $36. By 1877 the price was $30 and the duty $28. The price here at that time ranged from $61 to $67.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Will the gentleman answer a question?

Mr. GRAHAM. I will if I can.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. At the time we were buying steel rails for $165 a ton, were not those rails made by the Bessemer process?

Mr. GRAHAM. They were not.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. I think the gentleman is mistaken. I would like to ask the gentleman further, if all the rails made in this country up to about 12 years ago were not made under that same Bessemer process?

Mr. GRAHAM. They were made under such processes as enabled the Steel Trust to make them for less than $12 a ton, when England could not make them for less than $19 a ton. But the Steel Trust sold them for $28 a ton, thus making a profit of 133 per cent. That is merely an illustration. Every protected article is like steel rails, differing only in degree and not in principle, and in that way protection has been gathering wealth from the producers of this country until now 1 per cent of the American people owns more than the other 99 per cent.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. The gentleman from Illinois has referred to the testimony of Charles M. Schwab. Did the gentleman read that portion of Mr. Schwab's letter in which he said that the statement as to the price for which rails could be made in Pittsburg was written for the purpose of selling the property of the Carnegie Co., and if people kept that in mind they could place a better value on it?

Mr. GRAHAM. The gentleman from Illinois did read that in his testimony, but not in the letter, and the gentleman read further; he read where Mr. Burke Cockran asked him the specific question, if the facts stated in the letter were not true, and Mr. Schwab said that they were true.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. In a way.

Mr. GRAHAM. He said it absolutely. He said it is entirely true. I would be delighted to read the whole pages upon which that matter appears, had I the time. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SIMS). The time of the gentleman from Illinois has again expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. GRAHAM. For the year 1909 there were 1,633,775 tons of steel rails used in the United States. Six dollars per ton on that amount made $10,132,750, a nice little gift, which the protective tariff laws compelled the American people to give to the manufacturers on steel rails alone. In 1908 twice as many rails were used, and the gift was over $20,000,000 that year. And as the protective tariff works on steel rails so it works on every other line, the difference being only in degree. When it is an ideal protective measure, and shuts out imports altogether, it diverts all the tariff graft into the manufacturers' pockets. When not ideally protective some things are imported and some revenue is obtained for the Government. A perfect protection measure would yield no revenue.

It becomes an interesting question how our tariff thus divides the money taken from the people—that is, how much of the tariff goes to the Government as revenue and how much to the protected interests as tribute or graft? I have seen many estimates, and the weight of the evidence is, I think, that for every dollar the Dingley tariff put in the Treasury as revenue it put from $5 to $8 in the treasuries of the protected manufacturers as tribute.

I have never been able to persuade myself that such a law is a proper exercise of the Government's taxing power. I deny its right to take from the pockets of some citizens their hard-earned dollars to put them into the pockets of other citizens. As the Government has been collecting over $300,000,000 a year revenue from customhouse taxation, and as at least five times as much is collected from the people each year for tribute to the manufacturers, and as this has been going on for 40 years it becomes apparent why there is such concentration of wealth as I have already adverted to.

With annual tribute paid by the American people of from 10 to 20 millions on steel rails alone, it is little wonder that the 24 directors of the Steel Trust represent one-twelfth of the country's entire wealth.

How long, O Lord, how long!

Not the least of the objections to this system of public robbery under the forms of law is the fact that it is dishonest and immoral, in that the law authorizes the manufacturer to collect money from the people for his individual benefit and under the protection of the taxing power. It is like authorizing the grocer, by law, to put sand in the sugar or authorizing the butcher to weigh his hand with the meat; and the protection idea, the idea that he is getting the advantage, that the law enables him through protection to get something for nothing is sapping the foundation of public morals and of public honesty.

But, as I see it, the greatest evil is the danger to republican form of government. We can not safely ignore the lessons of history, and one of them surely is that wealth is power, and those who control the wealth of a country will control its government and its destinies.

When we consider that one out of each hundred of our people own over half the country's wealth, and that the ownership of that half, through banks, trust companies, insurance companies, and otherwise makes them the custodians of much of the remainder, which is almost as useful to them as the ownership of it, the danger becomes more apparent. And we should consider, too, that many of the very rich seem to be getting tired of a republican form of government and are willing, if not anxious, to use their vast wealth for the purpose of purchasing titled sons-in-law and arranging matters so that our children and grandchildren will have to produce dividends or rent to be sent abroad to maintain the titled descendants of these modern Tories in affluent dissipation.

While protection is not the sole cause of these evils, it is the most far-reaching and the most prolific one, and little progress can be made in other directions so long as the law permits a favored few to thus exploit the people. This bill is therefore in the right direction, is well worthy of support, and ought to pass. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY].

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Alabama for the courtesy he has extended to me. A new Member on this floor, it would ill become me to consume much of the time allotted to this side of the Hall in the discussion of this important question. I want to promise the House here now that whatever of merit or demerit my speech may contain, it will at least possess one quality which will commend itself to you, and that will be its brevity.

When I came here and looked around me, it occurred to me that this House might be likened unto a great school. It seemed to me, as I noticed the difference in the experience and the knowledge of the Members of this body, that there might be found here those who are freshmen, sophomores, juniors, and seniors in this great school. Indeed, Mr. Chairman, it occurred to me that there are those who by reason of their great experience and their many years of distinguished service in this body may well be denoted post graduates in this institution.

I thought when I came that I would enter as a freshman. But a few days ago as I listened to the speech of the gentleman from Illinois, the ex-Speaker of the House, and when he brought forth his map and talked to us about the geography of Canada and delivered to us what he was pleased to term a kindergarten lecture, I became convinced that I had overlooked one department in this body, and I was forced to conclude that the eighty-odd new Members would be considered as belonging to the kindergarten. [Laughter and applause.]

Be that as it may, Mr. Chairman, I am satisfied that experience in this body does and should play an important part. All the new Members have received at the hands of the old Members many courtesies which we appreciate. I have listened attentively to the debates on this and other measures. Indeed, it might be said that the new Members of this body have been noted for their careful, candid, and interested attention to these debates. And let me express the hope that we may continue so to do, even should the fortunes of future elections allow us to become old Members of this great body.

Mr. Chairman, I come from an agricultural district. Within the limits of my district the largest town contains less than 2,500 inhabitants. My people are an agricultural people. I voted for the reciprocity bill. I voted for it, first, upon the broad ground that its passage would be beneficial to the entire country, from one end of it to the other, and that between two countries such as the United States and Canada there ought to be no artificial tariff wall.

I voted for it, in the second place, because I believe it is to the interest of the agricultural people of this country to have no tariff between Canada and the United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.] When the statistics are carefully examined, and when it is seen that the balance of trade between this country and Canada is in our favor, I can see no disadvantage; on the contrary, I see great advantage to our agricultural people in getting rid of that tariff wall. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, I have here some figures in reference to this matter, which I shall not take the time now to read, but will incorporate in my printed remarks. They are figures that have been used before on this floor by other speakers, but they show conclusively that the balance of trade between the two countries is in favor of the United States.

The Government statistics show that in five years ending June 30—

We sold in Canada	$886,417,376
Canada sold to us	393,913,673
Difference in our favor	492,503,703

These Government statistics further show that in the same five years—

Horses:
We sold in Canada	$14,172,075
Canada sold to us	2,549,201
Difference in our favor	11,622,874
Cattle:
We sold in Canada	1,578,179
Canada sold to us	1,193,796
Difference in our favor	384,383
Meat and dairy products:
We sold in Canada	17,011,017
Canada sold to us	904,191
Difference in our favor	16,106,826
Breadstuffs:
We sold in Canada	31,596,556
Canada sold to us	6,679,884
Difference in our favor	25,916,672

Of the foregoing items we sold to Canada $53,030,755 more than Canada sold to us.

I voted for the reciprocity bill for another reason, and that was that I knew full well that just as soon as it was passed there would come right along after it this measure which we are now considering, the companion bill—if you please, the farmers' bill—which, far more than the reciprocity measure, relieves the burdens upon the people of our country [applause on the Democratic side], and especially upon that great army of producers, the American farmers, whom, more than anyone else, I have the honor to represent upon this floor.

I am strongly in favor of the passage of the pending bill. It will benefit my people. I am one of those that believes a Member of this body should legislate for all the people he represents without regard to their political affiliations, and this is one bill that will benefit every man, woman, and child within my district. This bill puts upon the free list practically every article used by the farmer in the production of his crop and in the equipment of his farm. It benefits every farmer in every nook and corner of this Republic. It places upon the free list the plow and the harrow used upon the hillside and in the valley, the cultivator and the planter used upon our broad, extended prairie land, the harvester and the header used in the West and in the great Northwest, the cotton gin and everything used in cultivating and caring for the cotton in the Southland, the wagons and the harness used everywhere, the wire fencing used to inclose the farm land, and the lumber with which to build the homes and the barns and the granaries. It even goes further than that. It is broader than that. It places upon the free list the bread and the meat and the boots and the shoes that are so absolutely necessary to the workingmen of this country, whether they work upon the farm, whether they work in the mines, in the factory, upon our great railroads, or I care not where. The very reading of this measure, the enumeration of the articles contained therein is, to my mind, sufficient to convince any reasonable man that it will be a great benefit to all the people and ought to become a law. I shall not read it, but will incorporate in my printed remarks the items which it places upon the free list.

This bill places upon the free list the following articles:

Plows, tooth and disk harrows, headers, harvesters, reapers, agricultural drills and planters, mowers, horserakes, cultivators, threshing machines and cotton gins, farm wagons and farm carts, and all other agricultural implements of any kind and description, whether specifically mentioned herein or not, whether in whole or in parts, including repair parts.

Bagging for cotton, gunny cloth, and all similar fabrics, materials, or coverings, suitable for covering and baling cotton, composed in whole or in part of jute, jute butts, hemp, flax, seg, Russian seg, New Zealand tow, Norwegian tow, aloe, mill waste, cotton tares, or any other materials or fibers suitable for covering cotton; and burlaps and bags or sacks composed wholly or in part of jute or burlaps or other material suitable for bagging or sacking agricultural products.

Hoop or band iron, or hoop or band steel, cut to lengths, punched or not punched, or wholly or partly manufactured into hoops or ties, coated or not coated with paint or any other preparation, with or without buckles or fastenings, for baling cotton or any other commodity; and wire for baling hay, straw, and other agricultural products.

Grain, buff, split, rough and sole leather, band, bend, or belting leather, boots and shoes made wholly or in chief value of leather made from cattle hides and cattle skins of whatever weight, of cattle of the bovine species, including calfskins; and harness, saddles, and saddlery, in sets or in parts, finished or unfinished, composed wholly or in chief value of leather; and leather cut into shoe uppers or vamps or other forms suitable for conversion into manufactured articles.

Barbed fence wire, wire rods, wire strands or wire rope, wire woven or manufactured for wire fencing, and other kinds of wire suitable for fencing, including wire staples.

Beef, veal, mutton, lamb, pork, and meats of all kinds, fresh, salted, pickled, dried, smoked, dressed or undressed, prepared or preserved in any manner; bacon, hams, shoulders, lard, lard compounds and lard substitutes; and sausage and sausage meats.

Buckwheat flour, corn meal, wheat flour and semolina, rye flour, bran, middlings, and other offals of grain, oatmeal and rolled oats, and all prepared cereal foods; and biscuits, bread, wafers, and similar articles not sweetened.

Timber, hewn, sided, or squared, round timber used for spars or in building wharves, shingles, laths, fencing posts, sawed boards, planks, deals, and other lumber, rough or dressed, except boards, planks, deals, and other lumber, of lignum-vitæ, lancewood, ebony, box, granadilla, mahogany, rosewood, satinwood, and all other cabinet woods.

Sewing machines, and all parts thereof.

Salt, whether in bulk or in bags, sacks, barrels, or other packages.

I can not, Mr. Chairman, in the limited time at my disposal enter into a detailed discussion of this measure. I have listened carefully to the arguments presented against it by those upon the other side of the Hall who oppose it, but I have listened in vain for a single substantial reason why it should not pass.

The opposition has been one of criticism and technicality. Some oppose this measure because it is too broad and opens too wide the door of trade. Some oppose it because, perchance, it is too narrow and does not place upon the free list some things which in their opinion should be there. Still others oppose it for purely technical reasons, because its phraseology or grammatical construction or something of that kind is not just right. The argument most frequently resorted to by those upon the other side has been that the passage of this measure would close factories and reduce wages. I want to say here, Mr. Chairman, that is an old, old cry. It has come down to us through many years. It has been used not only to frighten the Congress of the United States, but it has been used upon election day to intimidate the voter [applause on the Democratic side] and to carry the elections in this country. I do not believe that it will close a factory. I do believe that it will possibly reduce the income of some of the millionaire owners of factories, but it will not close a single factory, and it ought not reduce the wage of a single laborer therein. I have listened with some surprise, Mr. Chairman, to the speeches made on the other side. I have heard Republican speeches as made out in my part of the country, but I did not know you had the same kind of speeches here that we had out there. I looked for the speeches here to be upon a higher and a different plane from what we found them out in the campaigns. More speeches were made in my district by the opposition than ever before in the history of our district, and every one of them talked about the hard times of the Cleveland administration.

I am surprised when I hear gentlemen on the other side make these same old speeches. Why, Mr. Chairman, if, perchance, we should be discussing the tariff 20 years from now, and somebody should introduce a bill to reduce the tariff upon some manufactured article, those upon the other side, the high protectionists, would make great speeches about the hard times of Grover Cleveland's administration. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Even further than that, Mr. Chairman, I expect that on the last great day, the judgment day, when Old Gabriel gets ready to sound the trumpet to bring the dead to life, some protectionist, if he happens to be near enough, will rise up and say, "Mr. Gabriel, just hold on a minute before you toot that horn; I want to say just a few words about Grover Cleveland's administration." [Applause on the Democratic side.] Why, they talk to us about closing the factories. It has been demonstrated on this floor that the manufacturer of farm machinery takes his products abroad and sells them there cheaper than he sells them to the people here at home. Talk about the boot and shoe factories; they are exporters, they sell their products in foreign lands. And right here, while I am discussing boot and shoe factories, let me say this: Two years ago, when this same question was being considered, representatives of boot and shoe factories came before the Senate committee and the House committee and said they wanted free hides. "Why," they said, "if you give us free hides, we can do without a tariff, but we would like to keep that on for the name of the thing; but we can do without it. And if you will give us free hides, we will reduce the price of shoes from 25 to 50 cents a pair." The Payne-Aldrich tariff bill was passed and it gave them free hides; it gave them a 10 per cent tariff; but instead of shoes being decreased in price from 25 to 50 cents a pair they have been increased in price from 25 to 50 cents a pair.

But they say it will reduce wages. Out in my part of the country a great railroad system has for two or three months been trying to get hold of a president. They have offered the job to two or three high-grade men, but the job has been refused, presumably because they were already getting a large salary. Salaries have been offered to those men greater than the salary paid to the President of the United States, and yet that same railroad and many others, when we had the Republican panic of 1907 and it became necessary to economize, began economizing by discharging the men who worked upon the section for $1.25 a day. My friends, the trouble in this country with our corporations is this, that whenever, perchance, it becomes necessary to economize they begin at the wrong end of the line. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Instead of discharging or reducing the salaries of the overpaid officials at the top they begin at the other end of the line by discharging the laboring men down at the bottom. We witnessed in this House the other day a rather remarkable occurrence. A bill passed this House by a unanimous vote, not a single, solitary vote against it. A few days later we were discussing the reciprocity measure. Those upon the other side were divided; a majority of them voted against the bill and talked against it. A minority of them voted and talked in favor of the reciprocity, but whether they were for it or whether they were against it, they were united in that they were talking and speaking of their devotion and their love for the great American farmer. So I thought to myself as I listened to the discussion, this House is going to repeat itself; this House is going again to be unanimous; the minority of the minority is going to unite with the majority of the minority, and together they are going to present a solid front and stand by the great Democratic majority, they are going to vote unanimously when the bill comes up to give the farmers a free-list bill. But, my friends, I was mistaken, I was deceived. They talk for the farmer, but they are not willing to vote for the farmer. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The very ones, some of them who opposed the reciprocity bill, and gave as their reasons for it that it would be detrimental to the farmer, have in the consideration of this bill been most bitter in their opposition to it.

I know a farmer, away out yonder in the central part of this great country; he dwells in a little valley in the Ozark Mountains of south Missouri, among as good a people as God ever let live upon this earth. [Applause.] He came there when a boy. At the breaking out of the Civil War he entered the Army and gave four of the best years of his life to the service of his country. After the war was over he came back home, married, entered a piece of land, and settled down upon the little farm where he lives to-day. Years came and went. Many children came to bless that little home, trials and hardships came upon him, but he shirked not. By dint of hard and honest toil from early morn until late at night, day in and day out, he was enabled to provide for that growing family.

One by one as those boys and girls grew to manhood and womanhood they left that old home. Two or three of them located on farms in the near-by neighborhood, but a larger number of them, lured by the dazzling splendor of the great city, are now eking out a small subsistence in factories, in machine shops, and behind the counters in the great department stores. 'Way back yonder in old Missouri, on that homestead, the father and mother live to-day. Now, here is what I want to emphasize: Every year of his life that farmer has gone to the county seat, he has hunted up the county collector, and paid to him his taxes, State, county, and school, out of his hard-earned savings. Every year of his life he has disposed of the products of his farm and has therewith purchased the necessaries of life. During all those years every time he purchased an imported article upon which a tariff duty was levied, and those articles were few in number, he paid a tax for the support of his Government. And during all those years every time he purchased a home-manufactured article, upon which a protective tariff duty was levied, and those articles were many, he paid a tax to the manufacturing interests of this land. The tax which he paid to his State and to his county and to his school and to his Nation was just and right, but the tax which he has been compelled every year to pay to the manufacturing industries of this country is wrong, is unjust, and ought not to be. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

You gentlemen upon the other side promised to reduce these burdens. You promised it when you wrote your platform in 1908 at Chicago. You have not done it. Are you going to do it now? The farmer, Mr. Chairman, that I have mentioned here, is but a type. The life story of that farmer is but the life story of millions of farmers throughout this land. Honest, upright, and patriotic, they are the bone, the sinew, the highest type of American manhood. [Applause.]

My predecessor occupied a seat upon the other side of this Hall in the last Congress. I have the honor in the present Congress to occupy a seat upon this side of the Hall. [Applause on the Democratic side.] He was a member of the majority in the last Congress. I am a member of the majority in this Congress. [Applause on the Democratic side.] But, oh, Mr. Chairman, what a difference between that majority and this majority, as evidenced by what we have already done and by the measures that we have already passed, and a difference which will become more and more manifest as the days and weeks go by.

I listened to the speech of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], and I agreed with him in one thing, although I could not agree with him in the main part of his argument. He stated that if his party had been true to its pledges that we upon this side of the House would be in the minority instead of in the majority. My opponent, as I said a moment ago, was on the other side. He was a stand-pat Republican. He violated his party's pledge; he voted for the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill. If he had acted with the gentleman from Wisconsin and a few others on his side of the House two years ago, and stood by his party platform, possibly things might be reversed between my late opponent and myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, it has been said, and truly said, that this Government is a government by parties. When the assembled representatives of a party meet and formulate its platform, that platform becomes a solemn and sacred agreement between the party and the people that support that party. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And he who receives the nomination upon that platform does so knowing full well the contents of it, and if elected he should do everything in his power to carry into effect the policies and the pledges of his party.

We are to-day making history. This is a history-making Congress.

Already we have done some things which, though almost revolutionary in their nature, have been done with such a spirit of peace and unanimity on the part of the party that did them as to be almost phenomenal. When our caucus met—the Democratic caucus—and nominated its Speaker, I believe for the first time in the history of this country we witnessed the nomination of a man to that position, to serve his first term, by the unanimous vote of his party. That fact in itself shows that he stands high in the esteem and admiration of his party. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

We admire him, we honor him, we believe that he is capable of fulfilling the duties of that high office, no matter what its duties may be now, may have been in the past, or may be in the future. He is just as able to carry them out as any man who has ever occupied that position. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Yet, notwithstanding our love for and our confidence in him, believing that the selection of committees should rest with the body itself and not with the Speaker, the first thing we did was to place their selection with the House itself, and that has been hailed by the people of this country as one of the greatest steps we have ever taken for the advancement of representative government here. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Then, Mr. Chairman, when this House convened in special session it went to work, it got right down to business, and has been busy ever since. The first thing we did was to eliminate about a hundred useless jobs and thereby save to the people something like $182,000 annually. Then we took up and passed the resolution providing for the election of United States Senators by a direct vote of the people. We then passed the reciprocity bill. We passed the measure reapportioning Representatives to the several States. Then we took up the present bill. For 50 years Congress after Congress has convened and in the writing of tariff legislation they have passed laws in the interest of the manufacturers of this country.

Mr. CLINE. And we passed the campaign expenses bill.

Mr. RUBEY. Yes; as the gentleman says, we passed the bill requiring the publication of campaign contributions before as well as after elections, and on that occasion we witnessed the remarkable occurrence of every man present voting in its favor.

As I said before, the Congresses have heretofore legislated in favor of the manufacturer and the special interests. We are now considering a bill that is not for the benefit of the special interests in this country, but for the benefit of the great masses of the people. We are going to pass this bill, and when we have done so we will take up another bill of benefit to the people and pass it, and so, one by one, we are going to pass those measures which the people are demanding and which are of interest to the people all over the country. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And when the gavel falls at the close of the Sixty-second Congress this side of the House, the Democratic side, will have redeemed every pledge that it has made to the American people. [Prolonged applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 45 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky is recognized for 45 minutes.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, I learned my tariff creed from those patron saints of Kentucky Democracy, Beck, Carlisle, and Breckinridge, whose memory is still revered and cherished and in whose footsteps the younger generation delight to follow, as well as from those old Democratic masters of the tariff school of Watterson, Blackburn, and McCreary, men who have shed luster and renown upon our State and are now leaders in the councils of our Nation.

The star-eyed goddess of tariff reform, once more in the ascendency, has her abode and abiding place in Kentucky. [Applause.] As the result of the teachings of these old masters to whom I referred, the people of my State understand the workings and the operations of the tariff. They know that as the result of legislation placed upon the books by a more powerful political party unhallowed tribute has been wrung from them. They know that by unjust and unequal laws you of the North have gathered tainted wealth from them. They know that the tariff has not added a single dollar in value to any one of their staple products that support them. They know that their products are part of the basis of the surplus that goes into the markets of the world, and that the price has always been fixed there. They know that with the rarest exceptions the tariff does not increase the cost of any article when the exports of that article largely exceed the imports of the same. They know that whenever the price is increased by the tariff, the consumer and not the foreign importer pays the tax. They know that the tariff incubates monopoly and shelter trusts; that the freight rate often overbalances the apparent effect of the tariff; and that a prohibitive tariff brings no revenue to the Government, but does augment the bank accounts of the beneficiaries of the tariff; that a feast is preferable to a famine; that the truth is more powerful and enduring than falsehood; that intelligence is far better and more desirable than ignorance.

These fundamental, basic propositions have been understood by the people of my State since a time when the memory of man runs not to the contrary.

THE SURPLUS FIXES THE PRICE.

The statement has been made on this floor that the place where the greatest quantity of a product is sold fixes the price of that product. I deny the proposition; and no one can say, and say it truthfully, that the surplus of all the wheat produced by all the wheat-raising countries—I have selected that, because around that item this fight has been waged—that the surplus of all the wheat-producing countries in the world does not exceed the surplus sold by any one wheat-producing country in the world. The official statistics show that the world's product of wheat last year amounted to 3,667,494,000 bushels; that the wheat-raising countries of the world exported in 1908—the figures for that year being the latest that I could obtain—468,561,011 bushels, and the same year 24,469,940 barrels of flour. Estimating 5 bushels of wheat to the barrel of flour, we have a total surplus of wheat amounting to 590,900,711 bushels. If the price of wheat is not fixed by the surplus, how is it that in those countries, even in those localities where consumption exceeds production, the price of wheat does not exceed the price of wheat in those places where production does exceed consumption?

All of the counties in the district that I represent are wheat-growing counties. In some of them the consumption exceeds the production. In some of them the production exceeds the consumption. Yet the price in each of them or in all of them is the market price paid in the business centers, less the freight from the shipping point to the business centers.

Much has been said here on the floor about the vast area of Canada that is capable of producing wheat, and that the tide of immigration is rushing into that portion of Canada. Admitting all that has been said to be true, what are you going to do about it? How can you stop the development? The people are going to these lands, and the increasing surplus that Canada produces will simply be augmented by the increased area and the increased production. You have to meet the surplus of Canada in the markets of the world now, whether this reciprocity bill passes or not, and you will simply have to meet that increasing surplus in the markets of the world.

That this increased surplus may tend to lower the price of wheat I admit, unless consumption keeps pace with it.

The reports that are being received bespeak a most bountiful crop for this year. No farmer should be alarmed if the price of wheat should fall, for with the prospects of a greater yield, as a matter of course, the price would have a tendency to lower.

Year by year the Republican Party is filching Democratic doctrines. Behold at this belated day the Republican President of the United States, either converted to the true doctrine and faith or else unwilling longer to deceive the American people as to the working of the tariff. In his speech before the general assembly at Springfield, Ill., on February 11, he, in part, said:

> There is a difference of 10 or more cents a bushel on wheat and other cereals between the markets in Winnipeg and Minneapolis, and this difference is fully explained by the lack of transportation and elevator facilities and by the greater difficulty that the Canadian farmer now has in point of economic carriage from the Northwest to Liverpool, where the sale of this surplus and the price of wheat is fixed for the world. To let the wheat of the Northwest go down to Minneapolis and Chicago will steady the price of wheat, will prevent its fluctuation, will make speculations more difficult, and will furnish us greater insurance against the short crop and higher prices. But that it will in the end or substantially reduce the price of wheat, which is fixed for the world at Liverpool, no one familiar with conditions can assert.

In the practice of law I was always better pleased to make out my case with the other fellow's witnesses, and I have devoted some portion of this address to such high authorities in the Republican Party as the President and to Republicans of such high renown as our Secretary of Agriculture, who spiked the guns of the Republican teachers of the false doctrine that the tariff is of any benefit to the farmer when he stated in his open letter to the legislative committee of the National Grange February 9, 1911, that the price of wheat raised in the United States was fixed in Liverpool, and said:

> The United States produces surplus wheat above domestic requirements, and this surplus production is sold in foreign countries. The price of our export surplus is governed by the world's requirement, being regulated by the law of supply and demand. The price of wheat in the United States while we are exporting is governed by the price at which the surplus is sold, as a general proposition. Occasionally wheat corners may interfere with the law of supply and demand and temporarily affect the price.

The Republican Select Committee on Wages and Commodities, authorized and directed to ascertain and report on the cause of extreme high cost of living, exonerated the tariff by saying:

It—

does not increase the price of food production, because the cost is fixed in the markets of the world.

More than half the Republican membership in this House have been converted to this position, and have proclaimed this old Democratic law of trade. How long will you, O protectionists, continue to abuse the patience and confidence of the farmer? [Applause on the Democratic side.] The people have driven the Republican majority in this House from the floor, and the defenders of the high protective tariff have been driven from the floor in this debate. Slowly but surely the Republican Party is being driven from power and its untenable position. Formerly your party slogan was protection for "infant industries." This plea is now obsolete, it has faded away from your platforms. They dare not defend it in the face of the gigantic trust that it has engendered; it is worth any Republican's life politically to do so. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Your Republican President did not dare to proclaim this in the speech referred to before the General Assembly of Illinois at Springfield. On the contrary he said:

> There was a time when Republican leaders thought there was no danger in having the tariff higher than necessary to protect any industry. It was thought that if the country was made to depend upon manufactures behind the tariff wall, the competition between the manufacturers would stimulate the reduction in the cost of production, and thus reduce the price, but the temptation to combine by which the price could be controlled, and thus the excessive tariff taken advantage of, led to a modification of the protection theory, and to a declaration that the protection of any industry ought not to exceed in the tariff imposed more than the difference in the cost of production abroad, the cost of production here, and enough to give a fair profit to the domestic producer or manufacturer.

WASTE AND INEFFICIENCY INCREASE TARIFF.

Let us look at this proposition for a moment. The latest attempt to deceive the people is a tariff not to exceed the difference in cost of production at home and abroad, plus a fair profit to the manufacturer. So, again, the Republican Party perverts the object of government by guaranteeing a profit on legislative credit. It is a sly method of reaching the same result by a different route, and through this catch phrase to secure precisely the same result: and instead of being a radical modification, it is the same proposition with a sugar coating. The cost of production at home and elsewhere is an ever-varying proposition, even under like conditions, ranging all the way from efficient and inefficient management to the cost of construction, accessibility of raw material, quality of labor, character and kind of machinery, freight rates, fuel, location, and so forth; and now applying their theories, they are drawn to the maximum of protection as the basis of their protection, else there is no protection.

Why will the producer feel concerned about the cost of production when he has the guaranty of the Federal Government that, at all hazards, he can not lose, and that he is to have a fair profit? Aptly stated, the proposition is a premium on unbusinesslike methods. The duty rises as waste and inefficiency increase, and the limit of protection is the worst managed business sanctioned by Federal legislation, while the burden of the unnecessary and inflated cost is to be borne by the consumer solely by reason of such legislation.

During this debate much has been said about the difference in cost of labor in Canada and in the United States. A few days ago the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS], in the course of his address, stated that in his city of Detroit, only 2,600 feet away from his Canadian neighbors, with a population of 465,000 people, daily there was an army of people crossing the Detroit River from Canada into the United States and from the United States into Canada, earning their daily livelihood. The question of wages was not involved as to which side of the river wage received the highest compensation; it was solely a question on which side the job or the employment could be had.

Our friends from Iowa and Wisconsin are very much perturbed about the prices of eggs and poultry and milk, as the result of the enactment of the reciprocity bill. I have been at a loss to understand the whys and the wherefores of this alarm. Can it be possible that a Canadian hen lays more than one egg a day? Or, if the Canadian hen does not lay more than one egg a day, is it a question of the labor equation that is involved in the proposition? [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] Does the average Canadian cow give any more milk than the average American cow, or will Canadian milk stand more watered stock than American milk? [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] I take it that when it comes to extracting the fluid from the cow, milking is milking on both sides of the line.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] is broken-hearted over the fact that a Canadian fishing in the same hole with a Yankee fisherman can catch fish cheaper than the Yankee can. I presume that it is a question of the cost of bait. With us this enterprise of fishing has always been largely a matter of luck, and if the Canadian can outluck the Yankee fisherman I believe that the proposition is even beyond the aid or control of the Federal Congress of the United States. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

I would suggest, however, if permitted to do so, to the gentleman from Massachusetts that the best bait for a fisherman is to be found in Kentucky, but it is never used on the hook.

The above instances are fair illustrations of the ridiculous extremes to which protectionists go. It is a great blessing that the rains, the air, and the sunlight are under the sole and exclusive control of the good Lord above else some Republican would place a prohibitive tariff on them, and no one be allowed the benefits of either who does not vote the Republican ticket or put up campaign funds for that party. There are gentlemen on the other side of the aisle who do not believe that an Italian can run a pushcart fruit stand or a street organ, or that a Greek can run a shoe-shine stand without a protective tariff. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

These instances that I have cited simply serve to show to what ridiculous extremes protectionists will go.

DANGER SIGNALS TO THE FARMER.

When I see such defenders of the tariff system arraigned against the reciprocity bill as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], as the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], all of them high priests of protection, I am thoroughly convinced that there is virtue in this measure for the farmers and for the people generally, for the red light on the track is no more evidence of danger to the engineer than the position of those three men on this bill is to me. [Applause on the Democratic side.] When the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] stated, as he did on the 15th day of February last, that the Republican protectionist, when this vote is taken, marches to his doom I am fortified in my opinion. When the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] stated, as he did in his address to this House, that he was for any amendment that would defeat it or kill it, and to amend it was to kill it, I am further satisfied of the course that I should pursue. When the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], the rider of the Republican winds and the stirrer of the Republican storms, stated, as he did in his speech on the 15th day of April, and appealed to all men who are of Republican faith, that if the Republican Party is to live it can live only by being true to and supporting the policies of protection, which policy this bill attacks, my belief becomes a conviction.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] prophesies penalties will follow the enactment of the bill, and the United States Steel Co. proceeds forthwith to start the discipline to which he no doubt referred. Was the wish father to the thought? Would the protectionist welcome a made-to-order panic in order to forestall the bill? Let the interests bear in mind that the American people have been patient and forbearing, that if the issue to which he refers does come that it will be fought to a finish, and it will be in vain for them to cry "socialism," or if the disasters the gentleman from Illinois predicts do come be it ever remembered that the reciprocity bill is the offspring of a Republican President and that he brought on the difficulty. Let no farmer be deceived by the wail or tears of these men to whom I have referred. Their interest is not for him. They plead but to preserve the protective system and policy, for no one knows better than they that when the hoodwink is removed from the eyes of the farmer and he realizes that he derives no benefit from the protective tariff, then the protective policy is indeed doomed and the Republican Party destroyed. None of them believe in revision downward. The first question for the farmer to solve for himself is whether he is a protectionist. The farmer, like every other business man, is interested in the widest possible expansion of the trade on the best possible terms. I have taken pains to secure first-handed the freight rates on wheat and lumber from cities on the Canadian border and Chicago to points in central Kentucky, the portion of the State in which the district I represent is located. I now send it to the Clerk's desk and would like to have it read in my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the letter designated in the gentleman's time.

The Clerk read as follows:

FREIGHT RATES INSURMOUNTABLE PROTECTION.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, the point I wanted to make was that freight rates from Canadian points on wheat and on lumber from Canadian points and Chicago to central Kentucky towns are an insurmountable protection in themselves. From the letter, it appears that the freight rates on wheat from Minneapolis to central Kentucky towns is 32 cents per 100 pounds, or about 20 cents per bushel.

No one has ever claimed that there is a difference of 20 cents per bushel between Canadian wheat and wheat in the United States. The tariff, in my opinion, has never kept a grain of wheat out of the local market in central Kentucky. It has never kept a stick of timber or a plank from Canada out of central Kentucky points. But the freight rate has, and it always will do so. There is always a line in matters of transportation where all profit is consumed by freight rates or transportation, and it is impossible for Canadian wheat to reach central Kentucky towns and pay the freight, tariff or no tariff.

I do not say that there are not spots along the Canadian line, or even a twilight zone along the Canadian line, where wheat by reason of transportation or elevator facilities may not be higher in the United States than in Canada. But it is the exception, and it is not the rule. It should also be borne in mind that the millers of the United States require the hard Canadian wheat to mix with their soft wheat in order to make an export flour. An examination of the prices of wheat at Winnipeg, which corresponds to the Chicago market, will disclose the fact that wheat is selling at Winnipeg, which the gentleman from Indiana, my friend [Mr. CULLOP], well knows, higher than it is in Chicago. The closing prices at each place for the dates mentioned is as follows.

However, I will not read them, but will insert them.

Closing prices of wheat on Chicago and Winnipeg markets for the days given.

Two weeks ago May wheat was quoted on the Chicago Board of Trade at 85 cents per bushel. To-day it is quoted at 95 cents per bushel.

The total value of domestic breadstuff produced in the United States in the last five years that the home market could not absorb was $849,802,878. This went into our export trade. We imported only $20,808,905 worth. In the same five years we exported 280,808,905 bushels of wheat, valued at $290,314,156, and imported 3,908,864 bushels of wheat, valued at $3,418,127.

Mr. CULLOP. Will the gentleman permit an interruption there?

Mr. HELM. Certainly.

Mr. CULLOP. On all wheat shipped into this country for export of the kind you have described, to mix with the United States soft wheat, is not the tariff only 1 per cent of 25 cents a bushel?

Mr. HELM. Certainly.

Mr. CULLOP. So that there is practically no tariff on that wheat at all?

Mr. HELM. I wish, Mr. Chairman, to give some front-door propositions, some blackboard demonstrations, as it were, of the situation with reference to wheat and our exports of agricultural and farm products.

I make the broad statement that the freight rate from Canadian points to central Kentucky points will always offset all differences in prices, if any, on all competing products of Kentucky and Canada.

EXCESS OF EXPORTS OVER IMPORTS IN FARM PRODUCTS.

But a few years ago Germany either excluded or threatened to exclude our meat products from her market. This caused a decline in prices and alarmed the farmers. I refer to this as an object lesson, showing that the farmers need the widest market for their surplus products. The merchant who has the most customers is always the most prosperous business man. The United States is, as it were, a gigantic department store; it has everything to sell, and to prosper it must have the greatest possible number of customers. If this vast volume of agricultural products that we are producing here annually, and which our people can not absorb, could not find its way into foreign markets the price of our home products would necessarily fall.

Canada can never be a corn-raising territory; the seasons are too short. Without corn they can put few, if any, hogs on the market. During the five years last past we exported 391,901,418 bushels of corn, valued at $209,856,762, and imported 268,551, valued at $200,128. The reciprocity bill will give us a better market for corn and a better market for hogs.

Carload after carload of cattle leave central Kentucky annually, via Newport News, for Liverpool. All the time there has been a tariff here on cattle and meats of all kinds. The Liverpool market has been free and open to the world. Why has not our tariff made our prices higher here than there? The contrary is true; if it were not, the shipper of the cattle would need not protection but an asylum. The winter season in Canada is longer, necessitating a longer feeding season, with hay and corn to be imported for feeding purposes. The farmers in my section are frequently compelled to go to Kansas City, Chicago, St. Louis, and Cincinnati for cattle to graze and feed their grain to. They rush their calves and pigs to market, thereby losing the weight of the grown and developed animal, which serves to limit the quantity of food, minimizing reproduction also. The difference in freight rates will prevent the butcher stuff from Canada from competing with our butcher stuff in our near-by markets. The beef packers oppose the act because it makes for them a wider territory to control, and their agents who go among the farmers are walking delegates in opposition to this measure.

The exportation of meat products from the United States for the years 1904–1908, inclusive, has varied from $170,000,000 to $235,000,000 in value. If Canadian cattle are cheaper than our cattle, it occurs to me that, the freight rates permitting, it would be to the interest of the Kentucky farmer to buy the cheap feeders there, to which to feed his corn and graze on his grass.

The number and value of cattle raised in the United States in the last five years that the home market could not absorb and that were exported were 1,703,472, valued at $136,244,826. In the same time we imported 310,816, valued at $5,080,856.

The Kentucky farmer often goes to St. Louis, and even as far as Kansas City, for the low-grade cheap horse. The Canadian horse sells for more than the average-grade horse of the United States, and Canada is a splendid market for horses. And for these reasons, together with the protection resulting from freight rates, they are insured against a lower price for their horses. The high-grade Kentucky horse is in a class by itself, and defies all competition. [Applause.]

The total number of horses exported by the United States, as shown by the latest available figures for the years 1904 to 1908, inclusive, was 149,704, valued at $17,900,101, while at the same time we imported 29,852, valued at $8,900,521. In the same year we exported 29,815 mules, valued at $3,948,687.

Having shown the magnitude of our agricultural exports over imports of the same kind, to demonstrate that the tariff can not increase their market value any more than a tariff on raw cotton, on which there has never been a tariff, and of which we raise 13,000,000 bales and export 8,000,000, and which has increased in price from 6 cents to 16 cents per pound, I now desire to present a comparison of our trade balances along the same line with Canada, which is presented in concise form in the letter prepared by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD], which I will not take time now to read, but I will insert it.

The letter referred to is as follows:

The Lumber Trust and the Paper Trust are waging a fierce fight against reciprocity. They are making desperate efforts to get the farmer to join them. Wherever possible they have enlisted the papers which circulate among the farmers. They try to make the farmer believe that by reason of the tariff he gets more than the fair market price for his products.

Canada has a tariff which operates against our products sold in Canada. We have a tariff which operates against Canadian products sold here. Reciprocity is an agreement between the two countries to modify both tariffs with a view to more extended trade.

In spite of these obstructive tariffs a large trade has grown up between us and Canada. In five years ending June 30, in goods of all kinds—

Canada sold to us	393,913,673
Difference in our favor	492,503,703

These figures show that Canada is a good country for us to trade with. Any country which buys from us more than it sells to us is a good country to trade with. No tariff wall should stand between us and such a country.

Let me show you Government statistics for five years ending June 30—

Horses:
We sold in Canada	$14,172,475
Canada sold to us	2,549,211
Difference in our favor	11,622,874
Cattle:
We sold in Canada	1,578,179
Canada sold to us	1,193,796
Difference in our favor	384,383
Meat and dairy products:
We sold in Canada	17,011,017
Canada sold to us	904,191
Difference in our favor	16,106,826
Breadstuffs:
We sold in Canada	31,596,556
Canada sold to us	6,679,884
Difference in our favor	24,916,672
Total difference in our favor on above items	53,030,755

I have voted without hesitation for the reciprocity bill both times that it has passed the House because I apprehend no injury to the agricultural interest—a benefit rather than a disadvantage to the farmer—because it will give us a wider market and more customers for our products, and because its passage will ultimately lead to the overthrow of the protective policy, to which policy I am unalterably opposed, by which the farmer has been burdened, oppressed, and taxed to enrich those who do profit by its operations, and because, among its vices, it makes legislative pensions and hand-outs for business cripples and makes crutches for the special interests, furnished them by taxing the people, which interests use the Government as a silent partner as a guarantor against losses. I trust I have, in a measure, demonstrated that the farmer reaps no benefit whatever from protection.

OTHER SIDE OF THE PICTURE.

I turn now to the other side of the picture and will attempt to show who does get the benefit of the tariff, how it is done, and how the passage of the bill known as the farmer's free-list bill will benefit the farmer. At the outset it should be borne in mind that the United States leads all the countries in the world by far in the production of the articles embraced in the proposed free list. And just in this connection let me say that no one would claim that farm labor derived any benefit from the tariff on farm products. Neither does labor get anything out of the tariff on manufactured products. Organized labor gets only what the organization is strong enough to compel the employers to pay, though, generally speaking, when there are two men looking for one job labor goes down, and when there are two jobs looking for one man labor goes up. But be that as it may, we have ceased to hear those familiar speeches on that side of the aisle, "All kinds of work for all kinds of men." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The farmer's stock in trade is a given amount of earth, ever varying in quality and productive capacity, that can be only utilized for certain purposes, depending, among other things, upon the season. Each farmer pitches a crop that will, in the first instance, support his family. His success depends upon a variety of conditions. It may be a feast or it may be a famine. In the very nature of things he can not organize. Organization counts for everything with the manufacturer, whose stock in trade consists of a certain amount of capital invested in a given enterprise. The capacity of his output at fixed charges can be figured to a mathematical certainty as to quality, quantity, and cost. The different manufacturers can act in concert and can be put in action with military discipline. A given type of machinery, manipulated by an expert, produces a fixed result daily, while the farmer, operating along the best lines, can not control the yield, and he never knows what the harvest will be. What chance has a farmer with a surplus of 50 bushels of wheat to sell against a combined world's surplus of 544,000,000 bushels of wheat?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed further for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to speak for five minutes more. Is there objection?

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, there is no objection on this side of the House to the extension of the gentleman's time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is temporarily absent. Without objection, the gentleman will proceed.

Mr. HELM. How can the farmer at seeding time anticipate the world's production of the crop he pitches, as compared with the manufacturer, who can figure within a small fraction of what the trade will absorb? How different is his condition from that of the manufacturer or of the operators of the Brockton (Mass.) shoe factory, which has an annual output of $144,291,436 worth of shoes out of a total annual domestic production of $320,107,458 worth? How can the farmer ever know the exact cost of the other farmers' product on the market? The manufacturer does know the output that the trade will absorb, the cost of his own finished article, and the cost of his competitor's article, and can apply the protective tariff in the way of profit with mathematical accuracy, all the way from the fraction of a cent to a prohibitive tariff.

The prohibitive tariff is a legislative license to the manufacturer to charge the consumer what he pleases. It amounts to a concession, and can be utilized to multiply his profits. If the object of the tariff is not to make him a profit, what does the manufacturer want with it? It follows that the higher the tariff that can be brought into play the greater the profit. But the farmer is helpless to bring it to bear upon his output, his crop, or product, because he is unable to organize and control the cost, the quantity, and the selling price of the same. He is completely at the mercy of the manipulation by the boards of trade of the world's surplus, over which boards he has no control and in which he has no interest, and which he should avoid as religiously as he would avoid a gambling den.

WHAT FREE LIST SAVES THE FARMER.

Turning to the free list and taking the year 1905—the data for which is the latest available, because the departments are a set of masked batteries from which information can only be extracted, as it were, by a corkscrew—and apply the Payne-Aldrich tariff rates, we find that our domestic consumption that year of agricultural implements like those made free in this bill was $90,623,231 worth. These implements have a duty of 15 per cent protection, which amounted to $13,593,484, which sum represents the tariff profit to the manufacturer, and without which the same implements could have been purchased by the consumer for $77,059,747. In the same year our manufacturers sold at a profit in the open markets of the world, after paying freights and tariffs in foreign countries, the same class of implements to the value of $20,731,741.

They tell us that these implements come in free from countries that impose no tax or duty on like articles imported from the United States. They fail to state, however, what countries, if any, that produce these implements do not impose a duty on the articles that go to them from the United States. They say that foreign agricultural implements cost more than those made here. Since when did this happen? It is about as sudden as Cook's discovery of the North Pole and about as reliable. [Applause on the Democratic side.] What has become of the foreign pauper labor that gentlemen on that side of the aisle have harped on for the last 50 years?

In the same year our domestic consumption of sewing machines and parts amounted to $20,039,721. Applying the 30 per cent protection in the Payne bill, we find that the duty tax amounts to $6,011,916, which sum represents the tariff profit to the manufacturer, and without which the same machines would have been purchased by the home consumers for $14,027,805.

During the same period these same manufacturers sold at a profit in the open markets of the world these machines to the value of $6,104,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has again expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, in the absence of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] it seems proper that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM] be granted additional time. I take the responsibility, on behalf of the gentleman from Alabama, of yielding to him 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the gentleman will be recognized for 10 minutes more.

There was no objection.

Mr. HELM. Of a total domestic consumption for the same year amounting to $243,555,127 worth of sole, tanned, and curried leathers, on which the lowest rate is 5 per cent tax duty, the tariff profits to the manufacturer was $12,177,756, which, deducted from the actual cost, leaves $231,377,371, the amount it should have cost the consumers. Selling at the same time $9,444,873 worth of sole leather alone at a profit in the open markets.

In the same year the domestic consumption of boots and shoes produced in this country amounted to $311,942,303; allowing the lowest rate of 10 per cent, it amounts to $31,194,230, which, deducted from the actual cost, leaves $280,749,073, the amount the consumer should have paid for the total consumed. In the same year the same manufacturers sold at a profit in the open markets of the world $8,057,697 worth of said boots and shoes.

For the same year our domestic consumption of harness and saddlery amounted to $42,497,340, on which there was a tariff benefit in the interest of the manufacturer amounting to 20 per cent, yielding them a profit of $8,499,468, and which deducted from the actual cost leaves $33,997,872 that the consumer, except for the tariff, should have paid for same.

In the same period the 50 per cent per thousand tariff on shingles, of which the home consumption amounted to $23,940,089 worth, cost the consumer $7,241,566 more than he should have paid, except for the tariff. At the same time the consumer, by reason of the tariff on laths, paid the manufacturer $500,000 more than he would have done but for the tariff concession to the dealer.

Thus it appears from the few items in the free-list bill that I have been able to get accurate data upon, showing a total annual domestic consumption of $708,657,722, yielding no revenue whatever to the Government, there will be an annual saving in the passage of the bill of $79,218,410 to the home consumer of these items, which sum represents manufacturers' tariff profits, exclusive of trade profit. I have been unable to obtain from the masked batteries of the departments sufficiently accurate data to show the increased cost to the consumer on the many other items in this proposed free list, such as barbed wire, salt, wire rods, ropes, and so forth, by reason of the tariff rates, but I have sufficient information to warrant the statement that the passage of the free-list bill means an annual saving far in excess of a hundred million dollars to the consumer, solely by reason of the removal of the tariff rates, while the total annual loss of revenue on all imported items of like character in the bill now amounts to only about ten millions, which can be easily recouped by economies already inaugurated.

Lest we forget, I want to remind the Members that the above profits do not represent all that Congress, under Republican control, has done for the manufacturer in the way of grace. There is couched in the Payne-Aldrich bill what is known as "the drawback clause," which is another method by which the manufacturer gets his gain, if, perchance, he does pay any customs duty on imported material which he uses and which he in turn charges up to his victim—the home consumer—and which the Treasury refunds to him as its favored child if the goods are sold to a foreigner.

OLD GUARD RETREATING IN DISORDER.

In the face of these manifest blessings that will come to the farmer through the passage of this free-list bill, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] undertakes to laugh the bill out of court, so to speak, to pooh-pooh and make light of a measure drafted in the interest of the toiling masses of the people, and with an air of derision, in his discussion of the bill on the floor of this House, asks, "What are agricultural implements?" Does he need a photograph or a sliding picture to identify an agricultural implement? I observe that when he wanted evidence the gentleman read a letter from a trust magnate, generally not a disinterested witness when it comes to the free list, beginning with the International Harvester Co., the United States Steel Corporation, shoe and leather associations—professional jurymen, as it were, who are always in easy reach and touch.

It is written, "Where your treasure is, there will your heart be also." I have heard it said that there are none so blind as those who will not see.

It is generally true with the debater that when he is compelled to resort to ridicule exclusively the facts are against him. The question is, Are you in favor of extending the free list? If so, do not pull back. You have attempted to show by your tables that foreign-made agricultural implements sell higher in foreign countries than the same kind of implements made here sell for. Then, why do you object to the repeal of the tariff? Of what benefit is it if their implements cost more and sell higher than ours? I again ask you, What has become of that "foreign pauper labor" over which so many fits have been thrown on that side of the House? How was it that you had such a nightmare over the meaning of the term "agricultural implements" when on the 14th day of last February the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] moved to recommit the reciprocity bill to the Committee on Ways and Means with instructions to report the same back with the addition of the following articles on the reciprocal free trade list:

Fresh meat and all meat products.

What were meat products then? Rats?

Flour, cereal foods, bran, agricultural implements, cotton ties and bagging, binding twine, and lumber.

What were agricultural implements then? You voted for it. Were the market-garden supplies of Peter Henderson & Co., of New York City, agricultural implements or fine tooth combs then? Were farm wagons agricultural implements or aeroplanes? The gentleman said that burlap has recently become useful as a decoration for walls. Has the latest fad come in since the gentleman from Pennsylvania moved to recommit? Was macaroni a cereal food or angel food then? [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

The gentleman might increase his salary a dollar's worth if he will tell this House what cereal foods were then. How is it that the International Harvester Co. have left the United States to establish plants in foreign countries in which the cost of their output is greater than in the United States? That does not ring true.

In the first place, no doubt, they had the plant, but what on earth has become of that "foreign pauper labor" of the old countries where material is scarce? Again, he tells us that the packers have plants in Argentina, a new country that is developing rapidly. Of course there is pauper labor there, and everything is cheap in new countries, especially in Alaska, where one of our 10-cent dairy lunches costs a dollar. [Laughter.] But, of course, the Argentine packers can flood the markets of the United States, while the harvester company can not sell one of its foreign-made machines here, even though the machines are put on the free list.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] drew a beautiful picture of the prosperity of our country and attributed it all to the policy of protection. We have prospered, but the price that was paid was a dear one, after all. We have a country of marvelous resources. When I think of it as compared with the other countries of the world, the parable of the sower rushes to my mind.

Christ, speaking to the multitude, said:

Behold a sower went forth to sow, and when he sowed some seed fell by the wayside, and the fowls came and devoured them up; some fell in stony places where they had not much earth, and forthwith they sprang up because they had not much depth of earth: when the sun was up they were scorched, and because they had no root they withered away; and some fell among thorns, and the thorns sprung up and choked them; but others fell into good ground and brought forth fruit, some a hundred, some sixty, and some thirty fold. Who hath ears to hear let him hear.

Ours is the good ground that has brought forth a hundredfold in spite of the baleful influence of protection. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The gentleman from Illinois says that we have but scratched the resources of this great country. I hope that what he says is true, but I trust that, whatever the future has in store, this unfolding wealth will escape the grasp of the small group of men who now control two-thirds of the wealth of the Nation. To-day the Republic of Mexico is in a state of revolution because the President of that Republic has peddled out everything of value by way of concession. But a few years ago, under the reign of Mark Hanna, more trust and holding companies were formed than in all the past history of this Government. The reins of this Government were turned over to him, while he, in turn, handed out to predatory wealth powers and rights that we are trying to regain and control, not by revolution, but by processes of the laws' delay.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SWEET].

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, this bill is for the benefit of the great body of consumers both in the country districts and in the cities of our country. A large proportion of those who are now opposing this bill belong to that faction of the Republican Party which in the last Congress favored the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill, which so flagrantly discriminated against consumers. These same Members are opposed to the reciprocity agreement with Canada. Their tariff position was plainly stated by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] a few days ago when he said:

I voted for the Payne-Aldrich bill. I agree with the President in what he said at Winona—that it is the best protective tariff bill ever passed. I still believe that. If I had supreme power, I would wipe out some things in it.

The Payne-Aldrich bill and the supreme power of the gentleman from Illinois while he was Speaker were the chief issues last November. The people condemned the former as an unjust measure, and their condemnation of the latter was scarcely less pronounced.

The standpat Republicans are now charging the Democratic majority with "playing politics" because we have not combined the reciprocity measure and the free list in a single bill. This is an easy charge to make, and it is often made by the rankest politicians, on the "stop-thief" principle, in order to turn attention from themselves.

There are two ways of "playing politics." One is the old way which our friends on the other side of the aisle have played until it is threadbare. Their method is based on insincerity. Its foundation is a sham and its superstructure is deception and fraud. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The stand-pat Republicans have had long experience and can give us pointers in this manner of playing the political game.

But there is another way of playing politics. It consists of right doing because it is right and of gaining popular support by deserving it. Let me illustrate.

The people demanded a downward revision of the tariff with a just regard for the interest of the consumer. Republicans knew this and admitted that they did when they put into their national platform of 1908 a promise to honor this demand. If they had fulfilled this promise, it would have been playing politics according to the new rules, which they had not then and have not yet learned. For obvious reasons they can not give us pointers on this modern game. This recalls the experience of a representative of the Fort Wayne Electric Co., who sold a dynamo to an old German miller in a little town in Ohio. The agent inserted in his bid an item of $75 for the time and expenses of an expert to connect up the dynamo. When the old German saw this item he said:

Cut that out. Me and my boy Herman vill set her up ourselves.

A week after the dynamo was delivered the agent received a letter from the old man, in which he said:

Your dynamo is no good; she von't vork. I vish you vould come und take her avay.

The agent wrote a letter in reply, in which he said:

The Fort Wayne Electric Co. furnished the brains to make that dynamo, and it is as good as any on the market. The railroad company furnished the brains to bring it to you. You said you and Herman could set it up, and just because you don't know enough to do so you want me to take it back or to furnish the brains to make it work.

A few days later he received a postal card from the old German, in which he said:

The dynamo, now she vork all right; me and Herman fix her. But if she don't, I vouldn't ask you to furnish someding vot you don't carry in stock.

[Laughter.]

The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MADISON], with impressive emphasis, also accused the majority of playing politics because they refused to present these two measures in a single bill. He voted for the reciprocity measure, and I have no doubt will vote for this bill. No one questions his sincerity. He believed that the two measures should be joined, because in that form he thought their chance of favorable consideration in the Senate would be increased. In this his judgment is at fault, and from this error of judgment he has been led to make a charge which has no foundation and which he will regret.

Before leaving my home to attend this extra session I considered with great care the best manner of bringing forward these bills. There were three possible courses. First, to pass the free-list bill at the outset, in the hope that it would pass both Houses, holding back the reciprocity measure as a menace, which might be supposed to have considerable effect upon the President. This plan I discarded, because it was putting the cart before the horse. It was not the logical order. It involved the postponement of the very measure we were called in extra session to consider, and smacked of disrespect to the President.

The second plan that occurred to me was to tack the two measures together just as these gentlemen say we should have done. The reasons for discarding this plan were to my mind still more apparent. I had no doubt that the combined measures could be carried in the House by a safe majority, but I was equally confident that they would not in that form pass the Senate. From what transpired, or rather failed to transpire, in the Senate at the last session of Congress, it was safe to assume that the reciprocity measure had many enemies in that body, although it is quite probable that its enemies are not now as numerous as they were then.

But it is safe to say that even at the present session if these measures pass the Senate, it will be by the vote of some Senators who are not enthusiastic in their favor, and possibly by the votes of some who might welcome a plausible excuse for opposing them. The question, as I viewed it, was this: Would not the addition of the free list to the reciprocity measure furnish just such an excuse? Would not the combination of the two bills incur the hostility of every Senator opposed to either of them? Moreover, would it not enable a Senator to vote in the negative without incurring the full responsibility of his vote? It is of the highest importance that the vote of every Member of either House should place him clearly and distinctly on record, so that his constituents can tell exactly where he stands. When two distinct measures are joined together this is impossible. The present case affords an admirable illustration. A Member who might desire to shirk responsibility could vote against the combination measure and when afterwards called upon to give an account of his stewardship he could claim that he was compelled to vote as he did because of his opposition to either one of the two measures, though making a pretense of favoring the other; and if he were inclined to "play politics" he might have one excuse for the manufacturer and another for the farmer.

We on this side believe both measures are right. We want both of them to pass. They are both opposed by standpatters, and we "love them for the enemies they have made." If the reciprocity measure becomes a law, as we believe it will, we are confident that an inherent sense of justice operating upon the minds of Members of both Houses and of the President—justice to the wage earner, who needs cheaper shelter and food; justice to the farmer, who has never received any material benefit from protection and who thinks that the reciprocity measure unfairly discriminates against him—will cause the present remedial free-list bill to also become a law. An all-pervading sense of justice is one of our distinctive national traits inherited from our Anglo-Saxon ancestors. It permeates the great mass of our people, and it is well for their Representatives to keep that fact in mind.

Personal views have been expressed by Members on both sides of this House as to the probable fate of the present bill in the Senate. Such expressions are mere guesses without the slightest binding force upon anyone. So far as I am concerned, I refuse to be bound in the slightest degree by the opinions of others upon this point. The people of the United States have said that they want the cost of living reduced. Reciprocity with Canada gives some help in that direction. This bill gives still more. Before the election last November I promised to do what I could to that end. I shall keep that promise by voting for this bill. If Senators do not listen to this demand of the people that is their affair, not ours.

My sincere belief, however, is that the Senate will pass both these measures. Senators know what the common people of America are thinking and saying, and I believe that they will perform their duty in this matter both from motives of policy and from motives of humanity. If they see fit to combine these two measures and to send them back to the House in that form without amendments which seriously impair their value I, for one, shall be glad to give them my support.

The third method which I considered, and which I made up my mind was the most logical, the most likely to succeed, the least open to the charge of "playing politics," and in all respects the best, is precisely the one which was reported by the Ways and Means Committee and which we are now pursuing. It is the natural method; it is straightforward; it is businesslike. It affords the most conclusive evidence of our sincere desire that both these measures should be adopted, and all of our countrymen who are not blinded by partisanship will recognize the purity of our motives and will give their hearty approval to our conduct.

I come from a district which is largely agricultural, and, I might add, largely Republican. It lies in the so-called "fruit belt" of Michigan. We raise enormous quantities of peaches and apples. From Grand Rapids, my home city, we ship peaches, not by the carload, but by the trainload. Our farmers are applying the most scientific methods to the care of their orchards. They keep the ground well tilled and spray the trees. I know a farmer in my district—and he is a good Democrat—who has 1,400 acres of land. His farm buildings are numerous and well painted. From a distance they look like a small village. He has an apple orchard of 40 acres. He planted the trees himself 24 years ago. He recently refused $60,000 for the 40 acres—$1,500 per acre. He has an automobile, as have many of our other farmers.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PICKETT] said that farmers were leaving his State and going farther north. They are not leaving the fifth district of Michigan. They are prosperous, and neither need nor desire to tax the less fortunate wage earners of the cities in order to put more dollars into their own pockets. Their generosity is proverbial. It has been claimed that the Good Samaritan was a commercial traveler, because he said: "When I come again I will repay thee." But this claim is not sustained by the facts. The farmer in olden times brought his produce to the city, as he does to-day, but often from very long distances. He frequently traveled the same road back and forth. The fact is the Good Samaritan was a farmer, and the farmers of my district are his lineal descendants. [Applause on the Democratic side.] They are not only prosperous and generous, but they are also intelligent. When you Republicans put a tariff on wheat you did not fool the farmer in my part of the country. He voted your ticket, and was good naturedly satisfied to pay a tariff tax on everything he bought in order to give the manufacturing interests a lift.

But he knew all the time that wheat was an article of export and not of import, and he was not fooled by the pretended protection you gave him. What he did he did with his eyes open, and until you carried the thing too far and continually increased the tariff rates instead of lowering them, as you said you would, he made no complaint. When in the campaign of 1908 you and your candidate for President promised a reduction of tariff rates, the people accepted your terms, elected your candidate, gave you the control of both Houses of Congress—in a word, they completed the contract with you. The reason why they have lost confidence in you is because you broke that contract.

I do not wish to be understood as claiming that a majority of the farmers in my district are in favor of the reciprocity measure, but in almost every case which has been brought to my knowledge, where there is objection, it is not so much to the measure itself as it is to the injustice, after all these years of self-imposed sacrifice for the benefit of the manufacturer, of removing even the nominal and visionary benefits supposed to be conferred upon farm products without a corresponding removal from the output of the manufacturer.

Their position is stated with remarkable clearness in a letter I recently received from the master of the Michigan State Grange, Mr. N. P. Hull, of Dimondale, Mich. He says:

> As master of the Michigan State Grange, the largest farmers' organization in Michigan, an organization composed of 60,000 of the best farmers and their families in the State, I want in their name to make one last appeal to you in the interest of plain justice and fairness. If protection is an advantage and the capital and labor of the manufacturer are to be given that advantage, then by what principle of justice are we to be refused it? Have we not been loyal citizens? Have we not done our part to build this Nation and to make it wealthy? Have we not given as freely of our blood and of our treasure to maintain it in both war and peace as has our brother in the city? If legislation to lower the price of farm products is desirable, why is it not equally desirable to lower the price of other men's labors? What arguments can the cities bring for reciprocity with Canada in farm products that would not be as forceful and logical for us to use in favor of reciprocity with England in manufactured products?

He concludes with these significant words:

> All we ask is a square deal, the same protection for our labor and investments as other classes enjoy, an equal opportunity with others to provide for ourselves and our families. In God's name, are we not entitled to this?"

What the farmer wants is simple justice. He is willing to take his chance of a slight reduction in what he has to sell, provided he is given the benefit of a fair reduction in what he has to buy. That is precisely what this bill aims to do. It puts on the free list, not only from Canada and from England but from all the world, agricultural implements, wire fencing, lumber, fence posts, harness, shoes, meats of all kinds, bags for grain, bagging for cotton, sewing machines, and so forth.

The farmer and the laborer in the city are the consumers of these things. They know that most of them, even when produced in this country, are sold in foreign markets at lower prices than they have to pay for them. They know that their own earnings for the year are the difference between the amount they receive and the amount they pay out. They know that if the International Harvester Co. gets from the farmer $20 more than it should for a grain drill and $40 more than it should for a self-binder these sums are deducted from his net earnings.

Years ago, when the farmer was beguiled into the belief that the protection of infant manufacturing industries would create a greater home market for his products, he willingly submitted to the tax imposed upon all his purchases in the hope that it would prove a good investment, and that he would some time or other get his money back with interest.

He never dreamed that the principle of protection was to be a permanent policy. He never dreamed that it was to be carried to the extent of building up great monopolies in our own country. He never dreamed that tariff-fattened manufacturers would attempt to debauch legislation in their own interest and against the interest of those whose enforced contributions had made them multimillionaires. Even now most of the farmers in my district cling to the belief that there is inherent merit in the principle of protection properly applied, but they see no justice in tariff measures which absolutely ignore the interests of the great consuming public and make the rich in our country richer and the poor poorer. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Although the reciprocity measure was not an issue in the campaign last fall, I have made an honest effort to ascertain where the people of my district stand on that question. I have sent out several hundred letters asking for a frank expression concerning it. A majority of the replies are favorable to reciprocity, and, so far as I can learn, the opinion that it should be followed by the free-list bill now under discussion is almost unanimous. The only opposition to the free-list bill comes from a few special interests among manufacturers who fear it will reduce their profits.

The opponents of these measures have frequently said during the progress of this debate that a reduction in the price of cattle would not cheapen the price of the poor man's meat because of the manipulations of the Beef and Packing Trusts. If that is true, God help the poor, for Congress confesses its inability. If it is true, no reason can be given except that under the shelter of the tariff foreign competition has been removed and home monopolies have grown so strong as to be absolutely beyond our control. If there is no relation between the price these monopolies pay for what others produce and the price they charge when they come to sell substantially the same articles, the happiness and even the lives of our people have been placed in their hands.

If those on the other side who have used this argument realize the full force of what they are saying they ought to be the first ones to advocate the opening of world-wide competition, in order, so far as possible, to break down these merciless monopolies. If natural competition at home, which would induce cheaper selling where there is cheaper buying, is so far a thing of the past that all natural laws are eliminated, the most beneficent purpose which can possibly be served by the adoption of this bill is to be found in the admission of competition from abroad and the consequent destruction of these monopolies.

The bill under consideration is not too drastic. It will not cause the sacrifice of a large amount of revenue. By cutting off unnecessary employees and by businesslike economies in the House of Representatives alone a saving of about $182,000 per year has been effected. If that proportion, or anything like it, should be carried out through the other departments the $10,000,000 loss of revenue which this bill will cause will be made up many times over in a manner which will meet the approval of every business man and every thrifty farmer in the country.

These two measures, in my judgment, constitute the best legislation which has been enacted in this Chamber for many years, and yet they are merely the repeal of former legislation. They merely restore to the people natural rights which have been taken away by law. Buckle, the great English author, asserts that the best legislation of modern times is that which abrogates former legislation. He is speaking of England. In proof of this statement he cites the corn laws, which were passed for the purpose of enabling the English landlord to get higher rents. They were passed without serious objection, but it required for their repeal years of the hardest kind of fighting in Parliament and a war of classes which cost many lives. He cites the laws restricting the freedom of the press and the freedom of speech, and calls attention to the years of effort on the part of the greatest English statesmen to repeal those laws.

It is only within a few years that our own people have come to realize how the principle of protection can be misused. The climax was reached by the adoption of the Payne-Aldrich bill, when our people saw that special interests were in the saddle and that the very wealth which had been diverted from the many to the few was being used not only to perpetuate the system, but to render it still more oppressive. To place the people back in control of their own Government, to set right the wrongs they have suffered, to effect so far as may be a more just distribution of wealth, to remove the burden from shoulders that are unable to bear it, to bring the comfort of warm clothing and proper nourishment to those who can not now afford them, to call a halt in the mad march of money getting, to make a start at least toward a broader and better humanity; these are purposes which are inspiring the people in their widespread insurgency, and they are purposes which may well control the actions of this body. [Loud applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART].

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, during a colloquy this morning on the floor of the House between the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] and myself I asked him the question if it was possible that the contracts of the United Shoe Machinery Co. with shoe manufacturers might not be responsible, in a measure, for the increased prices or the constantly increasing prices of shoes. He very emphatically denied that that could be possible. About the time that my friend was delivering this speech a Senate committee was holding a hearing on that very question. The statement made in that hearing this afternoon was such that I believe it is important that, in conjunction with my colloquy with the gentleman this morning, I be permitted to extend my remarks in the RECORD to cover the evidence given in this hearing before the Senate committee this morning. I therefore ask unanimous consent to print this report in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The order has already been given authorizing Members to revise and extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Sensational and startling testimony as to the extent to which the United Shoe Machinery Co., of Boston, known as the Shoe Machinery Trust, has the shoe manufacturers of the United States under its domination was given to-day by shoe manufacturers before the Finance Committee.

The story told by the shoe manufacturers seemed to make out so complete a case of violation of the antitrust laws that one of the ablest lawyers in the Senate expressed himself freely in commenting on it.

"I think that if these hearings are transmitted to the office of the Attorney General the United Shoe Machinery Co. will have trouble on its hands," he remarked.

He did not hesitate to declare that the contracts which the Shoe Machinery Trust virtually forces manufacturers to sign are invalid. He declared that the signature of such contracts in some of the States would be a crime.

The whole Finance Committee pricked up its ears and took notice as witnesses recited the details of the story of how the United Shoe Machinery Co. held the shoe manufacturers of this country in thralldom, and how, under the system pursued by the company in question, the foreign manufacturers of shoes, especially the English, got much more favorable treatment than American shoe manufacturers.

The hearing set out to be one in which the shoe manufacturers were to tell the Finance Committee why they ought not to be subjected to free shoes. But it had not got far before the United Shoe Machinery Co. was run into. The committee found itself much more interested in the story of how what is alleged to be trust was keeping the shoe manufacturers in subjection than it was in the simple matter of duties on boots and shoes.

If the temper displayed at the hearing to-day by Senators who were told about the shoe machinery company is any indication, there will be strenuous demand in the Senate for prosecution of the United Shoe Machinery Co. and for the testing in the courts of the validity of its contracts.

The witnesses before the committee to-day were members of the Western Shoe Manufacturers' Association. They came from St. Louis, Chicago, Milwaukee, and other shoe manufacturing centers of the West. The first one to speak was William D'Oench, of St. Louis, of a leading shoe company there. Mr. D'Oench started out to tell the committee how the shoe business had suffered because the duty had been lowered on shoes from 25 per cent to 10 and 15 per cent.

The witness recited to the committee the list of articles going into the manufacture of shoes and the duty on each.

In this connection Mr. D'Oench pointed out that the English manufacturer of shoes had a great advantage in that all the articles used in shoemaking could be imported free in that country, while here there were duties imposed on these articles. He cited the case of a certain kind of wire, which costs 14 cents in England and 36 cents here.

It was at this point that the committee began to learn something about the operations of the United Shoe Machinery Co. Mr. D'Oench was asked why the American manufacturer did not import the wire, since the English cost plus the duty was far less than the American cost.

Mr. D'Oench explained that the United Shoe Machinery Co., which he said was a trust, controlled in this matter. The American shoe manufacturers signed leases on the machinery of the company and at the same time had to use the material furnished by the company. The company controlled the wire about which he had been talking.

"The Shoe Machinery Trust owns practically all the shoe machinery in this country," said Mr. D'Oench.

In answer to questions, he said it was a Boston concern and was an American organization.

Senator HEYBURN, Senator SMOOT, and others asked if it did not control the patents to the machinery in question, and if this control was not the basis of the alleged monopoly.

"The basic patents have expired," said the witness.

He then explained that the only way the American manufacturer could get shoe machinery was to lease it from the Shoe Machinery Trust, which at the same time furnished the wire and other parts. Mr. D'Oench said as good machines could be got in Europe, but there was a 45 per cent duty on them.

Senator SIMMONS asked why not abolish the duty.

"That would relieve us very much," said the witness.

Senator SMOOT then asked why the American shoe manufacturers did not buy English machines and pay the duty.

"Because the United Shoe Machinery Co. would come into our plants and take every machine out."

In the course of the hearing it developed that the shoe manufacturers were tied up to the Shoe Machinery Trust by 17-year contracts, that the trust had some machines which the manufacturers could not get in Europe, and that unless the Government smashed the United Shoe Machinery Co.'s alleged monopoly the manufacturers felt they were helpless.

Mr. D'Oench told of the efforts of Thomas G. Plant, of Boston, to compete in making shoe machinery with the trust, and how some months ago the trust bought him out.

Milton S. Florsheim, of Chicago, gave other details of the grip the Shoe Machinery Trust has on the manufacturer here. He said there was no market here for a competing shoe machinery company, because the manufacturers of shoes here were tied up by 17-year contracts, and no capital would go into the business of competing with the shoe machinery company.

Mr. BARNHART. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, it seems that the United Shoe Machinery Co. is protected by a 45 per cent tariff wall, and it avails itself of this protection to arbitrarily fix its own terms as to lease price and conditions to shoe manufacturers, who are thereby forced to pay any prices the Shoe Machinery Trust imposes. Of course the ultimate consumer—the wearer of the shoes—pays the extravagant profits which the United Shoe Machinery Trust admits it is making, and the gentleman from Massachusetts has been led into error.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 45 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK]. [Applause.]

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, in opening the debate in opposition to the pending bill, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], the brilliant leader of the minority, after criticizing the language of the free-list bill, undertook to say that up to the present time the legislative program of the Democratic Party in this body consisted solely of warmed-over Republican legislation.

The gentleman had reference, of course, to the resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States so as to provide for the election of United States Senators by the direct vote of the people and to the bill providing that there should be publicity of campaign contributions and expenditures before as well as after the election. When the gentleman took the position that the Democratic Party, in presenting these measures, was merely tracking Republican footsteps, he disregarded the record and the facts.

The Democratic national platform of 1904 and 1908 contained a clear-cut demand for an amendment to the Constitution of the United States so as to provide for the election by the people of United States Senators, and I have yet to read in any Republican platform of either of the years I have specified, or in any other year, where that party has taken such a position.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HARDWICK. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. Is it not a fact, however, that the Republicans did through the Congress pass such resolutions or bills prior to the coming in of the Democratic Party at this time?

Mr. HARDWICK. It is not a fact. On three separate occasions in recent years joint resolutions to so amend the Constitution of the United States have passed a Republican House——

Mr. MADDEN. I mean the House.

Mr. HARDWICK. And every time they met an untimely death at the hands of a Republican Senate. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman will not deny they were introduced in the House by Republicans and passed by Republicans.

Mr. HARDWICK. And by Democrats as well; but the Republicans, it must be remembered, Mr. Chairman, not only controlled the House, but the Senate, and what they gave the people with one hand they took from them with the other. Moreover, Mr. Chairman, in his opening speech the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] contended that in presenting the Rucker bill to amend the law relative to publicity of election contributions and expenditures so as to require publicity before as well as after the election we were simply tracking Republican legislation. The fact is precisely otherwise. In the Democratic platform of 1908 there was a plain, clean-cut demand for this publicity legislation. The demand was specific that the legislation should include publicity before as well as after the election. I have yet to read in the Republican platform of 1908 or in that of any other year where that party indorsed this legislation in any form.

Mr. MADDEN. What difference does it make about the demand if the fact obtained?

Mr. HARDWICK. None, if the fact did obtain. Let me tell the House what the facts were in reference to this legislation, and then our good friend from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] will understand how unmerited is the criticism that his brilliant colleague, the leader of the minority, has ventured to make on this floor in reference to the subject. In the last Congress we did pass through a Republican House what was generally known as the McCall campaign publicity bill, and I happen to know that that bill was literally forced out of an unwilling Republican committee and through a reluctant Republican House on account of the political exigencies of the hour and because of the attitude of a Republican President. I know something of these facts, because I served for years on the committee that perfected and reported this measure. The bill, as the House committee reported it, provided for publicity in respect to these campaign contributions and expenditures before election as well as after, and it passed the House in that form, and when it went to a Republican Senate, that body, in the exercise of that infallible wisdom for which it is noted, saw fit to provide that the publicity should be had after the election was all over——

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota rose.

Mr. HARDWICK. The gentleman will pardon me for a moment—and saw fit to provide that the stable should be locked after the horse was stolen, to use a homely but forceful phrase, and in conference this House was forced to accept the Senate's position, and did accept it on the theory that half a loaf is better than none; and that the bill, as amended by a Republican Senate, was at least a step, although a very short one, in the right direction. Yet the brilliant gentleman from Illinois, the able leader of the minority, has ventured to state that in presenting this measure in the exact form in which it is demanded by the Democratic national platform, and in a very different form from what a Republican Senate forced us to accept in the last Congress, that we are simply presenting warmed-over Republican legislation. God save the mark! I now yield to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Is not the criticism of the gentleman upon another body rather than upon this House, and in that connection I would like to remind the gentleman that when the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] opened the debate on the Canadian reciprocity bill, I think in the first paragraph of his speech—and it can be verified if the speech is ever revised and published; I think it has not been published yet—he stated, and got glory out of the fact, as he said, that a Democratic House had done more in the few short weeks of the session than the Republicans had done in 10 years, while I find, upon looking up the record——

Mr. HARDWICK. I would prefer that the gentleman make a speech in his own time, as I do not wish him to take up too much of my time——

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I wish to say that three times a Republican House has done the same thing——

Mr. HARDWICK. I have just stated the facts to the House, both in regard to the election of Senators and to the campaign publicity law, and if the Republican Party can get any glory out of its record in both the House and the Senate on these questions, it is entirely welcome to do it.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. It never passed a Democratic House at any time when you had it.

Mr. ADAMSON. We had better Democratic Representatives in the House than in the Senate——

The CHAIRMAN. Gentlemen who desire to ask questions must first address the Chair.

Mr. HARDWICK. No; these propositions were not presented in Congress during Cleveland's administrations because the abuses which have formed public sentiment on these questions had not then occurred. So much for that.

Mr. HARDY. If the gentleman will permit, I just want to suggest to the gentleman that he has omitted the important fact that after this Congress adjourned and the campaign was in progress the Democratic executive committee did put that into operation and published the contributions before election, while the leaders of the Republican Party absolutely refused to comply with that suggestion.

Mr. HARDWICK. The gentleman may, of course, be right about that. I do not recall. The question I am discussing is the political record of the two parties in both Houses of Congress in reference to this legislation.

Now, Mr. Chairman, after an unwarranted criticism of the Democratic performance in this House, which criticism I have already alluded to, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] then launched into an extremely technical and hypercritical analysis of the language of the pending bill. I venture the statement that any one of the revenue laws passed by either party during any Congress can be taken as a basis, and criticisms equally as superrefined, equally as technical, and equally as worthless as those made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] can be made of its language. The gentleman complains that the language of this bill is too broad. Mr. Chairman, this bill gives to American consumers, and to the toiling masses whose backs have been burdened for many weary years, some relief—relief to which they are most justly entitled, according to my opinion. If it should happen that decisions in the Treasury Department, or in the courts, should broaden the language even beyond our construction, then the first and most important result will be that the benefits of this measure will be increased and the burdens of those who toil still further lightened.

Mr. Chairman, in the early days of the Republic no statesman ever dared to assert, and no political party to contend, that taxation, either direct or indirect, was a blessing in disguise, and that the more you taxed a people the happier they were and the more prosperous they became. It has remained for latter-day, for Republican, statesmanship to advance that very remarkable contention. In the early days protection was justified and defended on two grounds: First, it was contended that it was necessary to build up and diversify our infant industries; and, second, it was contended that when foreign competition was shut out, either in whole or in part, by a tariff wall, domestic production would be stimulated and that increased competition between more numerous producers would keep down prices to the consumer.

In order that we may keep our history straight, and in order that the House and the country may understand how accurate is the statement I have made of the case for protection, I wish to now cite a few authorities on these two points. Before I do so let me digress for just a moment while I commend to my Republican brethren Alexander Hamilton's contention about whether the consumer or the importer paid the duty, made at the time when Mr. Hamilton was strongly contending that in most cases the consumer paid the tariff, and therefore the tariff duties ought to go into the Common Treasury, and not into the treasury of the importing States. In No. 35 of the Federalist, Mr. Hamilton said:

Suppose, as has been contended for, the Federal power of taxation were to be confined to duties on imports, it is evident that the Government, for want of being able to command other resources, would frequently be tempted to extend these duties to an injurious extent.

There are persons who imagine they can never be carried to too great a length, since the higher they are the more, it is alleged, they will tend to discourage an extravagant consumption, to produce a favorable balance of trade, and to promote domestic manufactures. But all extremes are pernicious in various ways. Exorbitant duties on imports would beget a general spirit of smuggling, which is always prejudicial to the fair trade and eventually to the revenue tariff itself; they tend to render other classes of the community tributary in an improper degree to the manufacturing, to whom they give a premature monopoly of the markets; they sometimes force industry out of its more natural channels into others, in which it flows with less advantage; and, in the last place, they oppress the merchant, who is often obliged to pay them himself, without any contribution from the consumer.

When a demand is equal to the quantity of goods at market, the consumer generally pays the duty, but when the markets happen to be overstocked a great proportion falls upon the merchant, and sometimes not only exhausts his profits, but breaks in upon his capital. I am apt to think that a division of the duty between the seller and the buyer more often happens than is commonly imagined. It is not always possible to raise the price of a commodity in exact proportion to every additional imposition laid upon it. The merchant, especially in a country of small commercial capital, is often under a necessity of keeping prices down in order to secure a more expeditious sale.

The maxim that the consumer is the payer is so much oftener true than the reverse of the proposition that it is far more equitable that the duties on imports should go into a common stock than that they should redound to the exclusive benefit of the importing States.

This is almost precisely the Democratic contention of to-day, and yet it was Alexander Hamilton's admission when he was giving his reasons why this revenue from tariff should be given to the Federal Government and not to the States.

To illustrate the statement I have made of the case for protection, I now call your attention to certain statements made by Alexander Hamilton, Henry Clay, James G. Blaine, John Sherman, and Andrew Carnegie. I first read from Mr. Hamilton's famous report on manufactures, made to the Congress of the United States December 5, 1791:

This is another and an efficacious means of encouraging national manufactures; but, in general, it is only fit to be employed when a manufacture has made such progress and is in so many hands as to insure a due competition and an adequate supply on reasonable terms. Of duties equivalent to prohibitions there are examples in the laws of the United States, and there are other cases to which the principle may be advantageously extended, but they are not numerous.

Again, he says on the subject of domestic competition in this same report:

But, though it were true that the immediate and certain effect of regulations controlling the competition of foreign with domestic fabrics was an increase of price, it is universally true that the contrary is the ultimate effect with every successful manufacture. When a domestic manufacture has attained to perfection and has engaged in the prosecution of it a competent number of persons, it invariably becomes cheaper. Being free from the heavy charges which attend the importation of foreign commodities, it can be afforded, and accordingly seldom never fails, to be sold cheaper in process of time than was the foreign articles for which it is a substitute. The internal competition which takes place soon does away with everything like monopoly and by degrees reduces the price of the article to the minimum of a reasonable profit on the capital employed. This accords with the reason of the thing and with experience.

Let me next invite your attention to the arguments advanced in support of the protection system by one of its most distinguished and most brilliant advocates. In an elaborate and able exposition of what he was pleased to term the "American system," Henry Clay, of Kentucky, in the Senate of the United States, in February, 1832, said:

This brings me to consider what I apprehend to have been the most efficient of all the causes in the reduction of the prices of manufactured articles, and that is competition. By competition the total amount of the supply is increased and by increase of the supply a competition in the sale ensues, and this enables the consumer to buy at lower rates. Of all human powers operating on the affairs of mankind, none is greater than that of competition. It is action and reaction. It operates between individuals in the same nation and between different nations. It resembles the meeting of the mountain torrent, grooving, by its precipitous motion, its own channel, and ocean's tide. Unopposed it sweeps everything before it, but, counterpoised, the waters become calm, safe, and regular. It is like the segments of a circle or an arch; taken separately each is nothing, but in their combination they produce efficacy, symmetry, and perfection. By the American system this vast power has been excited in America and brought into being to act in cooperation or collision with European industry. Europe acts within itself and with America, and America acts within itself and with Europe. The consequence is the reduction of prices in both hemispheres.

Hear Mr. Clay again, in the Senate, speaking on the same subject:

Competition, therefore, wherever existing, whether at home or abroad, is the present cause of cheapness. If a high duty excites production at home and the quantity of the domestic article exceeds the amount which had been previously imported, the price will fall.

Mr. Blaine, in his Twenty Years of Congress, says:

Protection in the perfection of its design does not invite competition from abroad, but is based on the contrary principle that competition at home will always prevent monopoly on the part of the capitalist, assure good wages to the laboring man, and defend the consumers against evil extortion.

In 1889 John Sherman said:

The primary object of a protective tariff is to secure the fullest competition by individuals and corporations in domestic production. If such individuals or corporations combine to advance the price of the domestic product and to prevent the free result of open and fair competition, I would, without a moment's hesitation, reduce the duties of foreign goods competing with them in order to break down the combination.

Mr. Andrew Carnegie is quoted in the American Manufacturer, of Pittsburg, under date of July 25, 1884, as saying:

We are the creatures of the tariff, and if ever the steel manufacturers here attempt to control or have any general understanding among them, the tariff would not exist one session of Congress. The theory of protection is that home competition will soon reduce the price of the product so it will yield only the usual profit; any understanding among us would simply attempt to defeat this. There never has been nor ever will be such an understanding.

Lower prices, which Mr. Hamilton claimed would result from a protective-tariff system, may have accorded in the "reason of things" as things appeared to him; it may have accorded with experience up to 1791, though I doubt it, but no living man, be he Democrat or Republican, can truthfully and candidly say that it accords with either the reason of things or with experience up to and including 1911. Is the reduction of prices which Hamilton and Clay, Blaine and Sherman predicted the shibboleth on which the American people commenced the work in 1910 of driving the Republican Party from power by giving to us control of this House? Has Mr. Carnegie's confident prediction that "there never has been nor ever will be such an understanding" among the manufacturers been borne out by subsequent results, even in the steel industry? How many, or how few, years elapsed before we find this same king of the steel industry selling out to a trust for cash and bonds and retiring from active industrial life in America to become the "Laird of Skibo" in a foreign land?

Let me next invite your careful consideration of the all-important question as to whether or not the experience of this country has demonstrated the truth or falsity of the contention of the protectionists that a high tariff, by stimulating domestic production, increases domestic competition and thereby ultimately reduces the price of the protected article to the consumer. Before I do so, however, permit me to call your attention to a brief summary of the tariff history of this country.

It is true that even from the beginning of our Government tariff duties that were more or less protective were levied and collected, and yet it is also true that the amount of protection afforded thereby was usually relatively insignificant up to the time of our Civil War. The actual rate of duty collected under our first tariff law averaged only about 7½ per cent. This was under the law of 1790, and even up to the year 1808 the average of duties collected upon imports did not exceed 13 per cent. The embargo act of 1808 and the War of 1812 resulted in the rapid growth of American manufactures, and the necessity of protecting them to some extent, when they were real infants, from a foreign competition was strongly urged, and at the close of the War of 1812 seems to have appealed to statesmen of all parties and all sections, but even the tariff of 1812, which was considered a remarkably high tariff, levied only an average duty of about 20 per cent. Under the tariff of 1824 the duties averaged from 25 per cent to 33 per cent. The one exception of the general rule in the early days of the Republic was the tariff of 1828, generally known throughout the country as the tariff of abominations, which imposed duties averaging 48.88 per cent, and which was finally superseded by the tariff of 1832, which practically restored the rate of duty carried in the tariff laws of 1824. The compromise tariff of 1833 provided that all duties in which the tariff exceeded 20 per cent were to have one-tenth of such excess taken off on June 1, 1834, one-tenth more on January 1, 1838, and another tenth on January 1, 1840. It further provided that on January 1, 1842, one half of the remainder of such excess was to be removed and on July 1, 1842, the other half of the remainder of such excess was to be removed, so that on July 1, 1842, the average ad valorem tariff rate would be 20 per cent.

The Whig tariff law of 1832 carried an average ad valorem duty of 32 per cent, and the Democratic tariff law of 1846, commonly known as the Walker tariff law, carried an average tariff duty of 25 per cent, which was still further reduced by the act of 1857 to an average of about 18 per cent. The Morrill tariff law of 1862 increased the duties to an average of 37.2 per cent, and the war tariff of 1864 raised this average to 47.6 per cent. Between this period and the enactment of the McKinley law in 1890 there were many changes in regard to various schedules and subjects, and usually these were in the direction of more protection to the manufacturer. The McKinley law of 1890 still further raised the duties until the average was more than 50 per cent, where they remained until the Wilson bill of July 1, 1897, reduced them to about 42 per cent. Under the Dingley law of 1897 the duties were again increased to an average of 44.6 per cent, and under the Payne law of 1909 they were still further increased to an average of 45.72 per cent, if we may accept the figures at that time made by Mr. Evans, the accurate and painstaking clerk of the Ways and Means Committee of the Sixty-first Congress.

So that it appears from the foregoing statement that our manufacturers and producers have had most liberal "protection," almost without a break and certainly without a serious check, in the upward march in the rate of duties since the period of our Civil War. It now becomes pertinent to revert to the inquiry I have just suggested, to wit: What has been the effect upon prices? Has competition kept them down, or has combination among our protected manufacturers and producers throttled competition and elevated prices?

In the year 1903 one of the most distinguished gentlemen who ever served in this House, a staunch Republican and a loyal protectionist, Mr. Littlefield, of Maine, put into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a list of 793 trusts, with a total capitalization of over $14,000,000,000. Of the trusts "discovered" by Congressman Littlefield, 435, representing over nine billions of capital, were classed as industrial combinations.

Census Bulletin No. 22, issued by the Bureau of the Census, Department of Commerce and Labor, in 1900, gave a list of 183 "industrial combinations," with a total authorized capital of $3,607,539,200. Of these 183 trusts, 7 were formed in the year 1897, 20 in 1898, 79 in 1899, and 13 in 1900 prior to June 30 of that year. Nearly two-thirds of these trusts were therefore formed in the three years immediately following the passage of the Dingley tariff law.

In his interesting book called The Truth About the Trusts, published in March, 1904, Mr. John Moody gives a list of 318 important, active, industrial trusts, with a capitalization of $7,246,342,533. Of these 318 trusts, 236 were capitalized at about $6,000,000,000, and were incorporated subsequent to January 1, 1898. So that it would appear that trust combination received its first splendid impetus through the Dingley tariff law.

Let me give you another list of just a few of the larger trusts, taken from the splendid work of Mr. Franklin Pierce, of the New York bar, The Tariff and the Trusts, published in 1907:

The Meat Trust, a combination of the National Packing Co., Armour & Co., Swift & Co., John P. Squire & Co., Schwarzschild & Sulzberger Co., St. Louis Dressed Beef & Provision Co., Northern Packing & Provision Co., Libby, McNeill & Libby, protected by 2 cents a pound on beef and pork and 5 cents a pound on bacon and ham, practically controlling the whole market and fixing the price on the domestic product at a price equal to that of 1860, when butchers slaughtered animals by hand and availed themselves in no way of the by-products. This trust is also protected on most of its by-products.

The Standard Oil Co., controlling 20 different companies, with an authorized capitalization of $102,000,000, protected on many of its by-products by heavy duties and by rebates on its imported tin cans of 99 per cent of the duty.

The American Radiator Co., having an authorized capital stock of about $10,000,000 and 12 plants,, and controlling 80 per cent of the industry.

The American Seeding Machine Co., known as the Seeding Machine Trust, having an authorized capital of $15,000,000 and 6 plants, and controlling 90 per cent of the trade.

The American Sewer Pipe Co., having an authorized capital of $8,000,000 and controlling from 40 to 50 per cent of the industry.

In the elaborate report presented by Senator LODGE, of Massachusetts, to the Senate on June 23, 1910, in behalf of the Select Committee of the Senate on Wages and Prices of Commodities, under the subhead "Combinations and associations," it is admitted by the majority members of the Senate committee that the country is teeming with trusts and industrial combinations, and that every line of business and industry is honeycombed with them.

Without multiplying words or extending the investigation further on this particular point, I think we can safely conclude what everyone with any common sense or with any experience or observation knows, and everyone with any candor or sincerity concedes, that the domestic competition that was promised us years ago by advocates of the protective system has utterly broken down and failed, and that in its stead we have enthroned industrial and trust combinations of spectacular size, without precedent or parallel in the history of our own or any other country. Competition has died an untimely death at the hands of combination and monopoly extorts from the consuming public the utmost farthing that can be wrung from necessity.

Let me observe here that, in the face of well-established facts, apologists for the protective system often assert that free-trade England is as badly infested with trusts as protected America. On this subject, I desire to quote briefly from the very interesting address of Mr. Byron W. Holt, of New York, made in the year 1907 at Chicago, Ill., at the conference on trusts and combinations:

The Industrial Commission, a Republican partisan protectionist body of the most pronounced type, sent Prof. J. W. Jenks to Europe to find as many trusts there as possible. He found 35 so-called trusts in England, with a total capital of $460,000,000, or less than one-third that of our pet Steel Trust. He quoted tables from Liefman's book, showing that there had been 345 trusts in Germany, and that from 230 to 250 were in existence there in 1897. He stated that "in England the movement toward combination has not gone so far as in either Austria or Germany"—both highly protected countries. He stated that the English trusts have but little water in the capitalization as compared with American trusts; that the English trusts have had little or no effect in advancing prices; and that the (then) recent slight advance in prices was "due in good part to the increase in the prices of the raw materials." In Germany he found that many of the trusts, taking advantage of the high-tariff duties, had advanced prices very much. This was particularly true of the Iron and Steel Trusts and of the Sugar Trust, or cartel, both of which pattern after our much larger trusts and sell goods for export much below the home prices.

Other writers find even fewer trusts in England than did Prof. Jenks. Mr. Wilhelm Berdrow, a German economist, says in the May, 1899, Forum:

"As far as England is concerned, it must be admitted that the trust system has as yet found but tardy acceptance in that country. This is doubtless due in some degree to the thorough appreciation of the principle of free trade, for it is well known that the largest trusts are powerless unless their interests are secured by a protective tariff excluding from the whole market the product of foreign countries."

Mr. Thomas Scanlon, of Liverpool, writing of trusts in England, said: "It can not be said that we suffer in any appreciable degree from combinations of producers to keep up prices."

These and other authorities virtually agree that, instead of the price-raising, Congress-controlling, law-defying, bulldozing, and all-powerful tariff monsters with which we are familiar in this country, the so-called trusts of England are really only harmless syndicates, with little or no control over prices. They exist not because they have any monopoly, but because production can be carried on more economically on a large than a small scale. If they attempt to control prices, as did the recently formed Soap Trust, they commit what, in England, is regarded as the unpardonable sin. The Soap Trust endured but a few short weeks. A really free people would not stand, for one month, the robbery of any one of our scores of plundering tariff trusts.

The testimony is overwhelming that trusts do not flourish in free-trade England as they do in protected America, Germany, and the United States. Nowhere, outside of the Republican Campaign Book and of the organs of protection, published by organizations supported by the protected interests, is it even pretended that England has trusts comparable to those in this country. These organs brazenly disregard and defy all known facts. Thus the Republican Text Book of 1900 said:

"England has no tariff, and trusts exist and flourish in free-trade England—trusts more monstrous than any that we know anything about."

The monstrous trusts, it was said, "are solely, thoroughly, and absolutely the product of the Cobdenite free trade."

The American Economist, organ of the Protective Tariff League, on October 18, 1907, says:

"Former Gov. Douglas says the only way to save this country from the trusts is to cut down the tariff. Douglas would have a terrible time telling the British people how they were to get out of the clutches of the trusts. They are in the clutches more than the people of the United States, and they have no tariff to cut down."

I hesitate to say that the writers of these statements knew them to be false and that they deliberately distort and falsify facts and figures in order to deceive the voters and to prolong our accursed tariff system. I prefer to credit such misrepresentations to the overzealous efforts of protection fanatics who honestly believe that foreign trade and commerce is a curse and who would like to see each country surrounded by walls of fire.

That we have the trusts with us, and with us at every turn, can neither be denied nor doubted. It seems to me equally undeniable and undoubted that the effect of these combinations is and has been necessarily and naturally to raise the prices of the products they control. In the report of the select committee of the Senate on Wages and Prices of Commodities, already referred to, there is this statement, quoted from page 11 of the majority report:

Wholesale prices in the United States in 1909, as measured by the prices of the 257 commodities included in the price index number of the United States Bureau of Labor, advanced 3 per cent over 1908 and 14.5 per cent over 1900. The price in 1909, however, was 2.3 per cent below the high point reached in 1907. Beginning with September, 1908, wholesale prices increased month by month without a break until March, 1910. In March, 1910, prices were 21.1 per cent higher than the average for the year 1900 and 18.5 per cent above the price in March, 1900.

Quoting again from the excellent speech of Mr. Holt in 1907:

Since 1897, and especially since 1899, the prices of trust products have been maintained at extremely high points. Because of excellent crops, sold at good prices, this country has been prosperous since 1897. But the protected trusts have skimmed the cream of our prosperity and have left only the skimmed milk for workingmen and farmers. Money wages have risen, but tardily and slowly, and only about half as much as has the cost of living. The prices of farm products, until this year, had risen less than had the prices of most manufactured goods.

The average rise of prices is best shown by Dun's index numbers. These include the prices of 350 commodities and give a weight in accordance with its importance in consumption. On July 1, 1897, Dun's index number was 72,455; on March 1, 1907, it was 109,913, showing an advance in average prices since 1897 of 51.7 per cent. By April 1, 1907, there had been a decline of about 2 per cent. For some reason Dun's figures, which until then had been published regularly for 30 years, have not been published since April. It will be recalled that, because of the cold spring the prices of cotton, wheat, corn, oats, etc., rose rapidly during April. Possibly there was some connection between these two facts. Possibly the publication of these cost-of-living figures was "accelerating public sentiment" in the wrong direction—for the trusts. It is worth noting that one year previously the Department of Commerce and Labor at Washington suddenly ceased to publish Dun's telltale figures in its monthly reports. There was considerable of a "spread" between Dun's and the Government's figures of prices, and the spread was growing rapidly. These coincidences may have had nothing to do with the stoppage of the most scientifically constructed cost-of-living figures ever published. Regardless of economic or political consequences, we earnestly hope that Dun's Review will soon continue to give to the world the benefit of its price tables.

Bradstreet's less scientifically constructed figures show an increase in wholesale prices of 56 per cent from July 1, 1898, to March 1, 1907. The figures of the Labor Bureau at Washington show that wholesale prices averaged 40.6 per cent higher in 1906 than in 1897. They show that retail prices of food averaged 15.7 per cent higher in 1906 than for the 10 years from 1890 to 1899. These Government figures are very unsatisfactory and are evidently made to order. Almost any kind, and almost all kinds, of retail prices can be obtained, even on different streets of the same city. They afford excellent opportunity for trick juggling. It is fair to assume that these opportunities have been utilized. We know that the statistics of the census, so far as they relate to wages and manufactures—especially in the protected industries—are juggled so that they are almost worthless.

It is reasonably certain that the price level in this country is now between 50 per cent and 60 per cent higher than it was 10 years ago. It is not pretended that all of this advance should be credited to the Dingley tariff and its brood of trusts. The Labor Bureau report of last spring suggested that "internal revenue and tariff acts have in a marked degree affected prices by helping them to move upward." This is undoubtedly true. About how much of the advance should be credited to the tariff and trusts can be learned from a comparison of our price figures with those of England, where there are no protective duties and no tariff trusts.

Sauerbeck's index numbers advanced 35.1 per cent from July, 1896, to March, 1907—from 50.2 per cent to 80 per cent. The index number of the London Economist advanced 37.6 per cent from the end of 1897 to March, 1907. Since March last it has declined rapidly and is now only 30 per cent higher than in 1897. Its figures in 1897 were 1,890, and on October 1, 1907, 2,457.

It is evident from these figures that during the last 10 years prices have risen about 55 per cent in this country and 35 per cent in England. The 35 per cent advance is undoubtedly due to the depreciation of gold. A similar advance has occurred in all countries. The greater advance in this country, Canada, and Japan can fairly be credited to the higher tariffs of these countries and to the protected trusts.

That we now have the highest prices that this country has known in many years, and the highest prices in the world, is so well known that it does not seem to me to require much elaboration. The people of the United States understand it tolerably well and punished the Republican Party in November, 1910, for its failure to keep faith with them by reducing the tariff and thereby lessening the cost of living.

That the trusts are here and that high prices are with us also is not merely a coincidence. These facts bear the relation to each other of cause and effect. On this subject let me quote briefly from the report of the Senate committee already referred to:

The fact that prices of some of the commodities manufactured by the industrial combinations have not advanced as much as have commodities not manufactured by trusts does not prove that industrial combinations have not held prices at a higher level than was justified.

Industrial combinations in their very nature make for economies in production by placing the control of the business in the hands of a few individuals and thus reducing general expenses; they also reduce materially the cost of distribution by enabling products to be distributed from the nearest producing point. Industrial combinations are also able to maintain or steady prices. The possibility of industrial combinations contributing to the advance or maintaining of prices, even though prices of their products may have risen less than have other articles, is plainly shown by witnesses engaged in slaughtering cattle, who have testified before the committee that all the profit they would ask would be the value of the by-products, which they are not able to utilize but which the large packers are able to dispose of. The economies of production are, of course, a result of the development of the factory system, and the well-organized industrial combinations represent the highest development of the factory system.

While industrial combinations may result in economies of production and distribution, the fact that competition is either wholly or partly removed leads to abuses. Thus, according to witnesses who testified before the committee, the International Harvester Co. has not only unreasonably advanced the price of self-binders, but have changed the method of sale in such a way as to result in many cases in a loss to farmers. Before the organization of the International Harvester Co. the local dealer selling the binder sent a mechanic to "set up" the machine and to remain a few hours until the machine was running smoothly, and in case repairs were needed they were supplied immediately from the stock of the local dealer. Since the organization of the International Harvester Co. the machine, when purchased by the farmer, is sent "knocked down" to his nearest railroad station, and the farmer must set up his machine, and in case repairs are needed the machine is idle until the repairs are forwarded by express from the branch house, usually located in some large city and not necessarily convenient to the grain section.

It is true that the majority report of the Senate Committee on Wages and Prices of Commodities advances the remarkable contention that in some cases the trusts have lowered prices of the products they control, but it is equally true that in those cases the majority report fails to mention the fact that the foreign price has been lowered even below the American price, and that in America the trusts have prevented our consumers from obtaining the reduced prices that ought to have come from improvements of manufacture and natural causes, such as greater natural supplies. Wherever prices on trust-made articles have been lowered here, they have not been lowered one moiety of what they would have been lowered if the people of this country had received the advantages of improvements in manufacture and of the natural causes that seem to operate everywhere else on earth except in trust-ridden America. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Everyone knows that in this country there is hardly a branch of human activity, hardly a line of business or industry that is not either directly or indirectly controlled by these trusts and combinations. Our children are rocked in trust-made cradles, our dead are buried in trust-made coffins, and if there is an article of necessity that the American citizen must use, or a luxury that he wishes to use, that is not in some way or the other, directly or indirectly, controlled by these interests, I have yet to discover it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

What are we to do about it? Is the Congress of the United States impotent? Have vested wrongs grown so hoary with age that they have become vested rights? Are the people to continue to have profits guaranteed by law because they happen to be engaged in one branch of industry rather than another? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Twenty-one years ago Senator John Sherman, of Ohio, suggested one remedy. However much we may disagree with either the economic theories or political principles of the great Ohio Senator, yet we all must agree that he was an able statesman and a great man, and that his remedy is entitled to receive not only careful consideration but fair trial. The remedy he proposed was to revamp, with only slight modifications, the common law against forestalling, regrading, and engrossing. The principle is as old as the Anglo-Saxon law, indeed, as human civilization itself. It is based on an inherent opposition to monopoly. I refer, of course, to the celebrated Sherman antitrust law of July 2, 1890, by which combinations in the restraint of trade or commerce in the several States by way of trust or otherwise are declared to be illegal. Are we to rely on that law as a complete panacea for all our evils? I think not. I think if we were to adopt that policy and rely wholly upon it, we would be guilty of equal stupidity as a man would be if his blood was impure and therefore his body was afflicted with sores, and he should go to a doctor and have the sores cut out, instead of going to a doctor for treatment of the impurity in his blood that caused the sores. I believe that to put the trust magnates in jail, that to enforce the law against the criminals who violate the antitrust law will do a great deal of good, but that can never be a complete remedy, no matter how vigilant, how industrious and impartial is the prosecution; as long as the system that creates these criminals continues in existence, trusts and combinations will be bred by it more rapidly than they can be broken up by criminal prosecutions.

What, then, is the real remedy? I fear that I can not in the course of this speech undertake to amplify it as fully as I would like, but I venture to express the hope that I can at least suggest it. The remedy must come from the complete readjustment of our entire economic system. I mean particularly that system so far as same is related to or is based upon the tariff laws of the country. I understand, and I make this statement with that reluctance that a man naturally feels in admitting conditions that require him to submit even temporarily to wrong and injustice, we can not do this at once or suddenly. If our whole tariff system was changed in the twinkling of an eye it might and would probably throw this country into a terrible business panic from which we would only recover with great difficulty and after great suffering. But it is my deliberate and mature judgment that we ought to come as rapidly as possible to another and to a fundamentally different view of tariff taxation. Our industries are no longer infants. They are conquering the markets of the world and are competing with the industries of other nations all over the earth without tariff aid. Bitter experience has demonstrated to the American people that existence of a high tariff law that severely restricts foreign importations affords an irresistible temptation for the formation of combinations and monopolies that increase the prices of the products they control and raise the cost of living. The true American system of the twentieth century must and will eventually be, so far as this question is concerned, an imposition of import duties on articles of strict luxury and on noncompetitive articles alone. A great English statesman, addressing a great English constituency, said 80 years ago that he would never vote for any law that, under the guise of taxation, enabled one Englishman to charge another Englishman a penny more for any article made in England than he could have charged, but for the existence of a tax law. Are we less patriotic than this foreign statesman was, or do we love our own people less than he did his? Are we less prepared to do them justice? Yet no man can dispute the proposition that so long as we continue to lay duties on competitive products, we not only burden our people with the payment of three hundred millions of revenue that is actually received and actually goes into the Public Treasury, but also we put upon them a far greater burden that comes from the enhancement of prices on articles of domestic manufacture or production that are so protected from foreign competition. The most careful economists who have considered this question estimate that this indirect burden is fully five times as great as the revenue the Government collects from the duties imposed. In other words, besides the $300,000,000 that finds its way each year into the Treasury in the shape of these duties, fully fifteen hundred millions per year is extracted from the pockets of the American consumer in the enhanced price that he must pay for articles of domestic manufacture or production over and above what he would have to pay but for the protective duties.

To my mind, this is the greatest injustice that can be done the people under the guise and form of law, and to such a system I am unalterably and irrevocably opposed. It may be contended, however, that we could not raise sufficient revenue from the tariff to run the Government under this system. In answer to that objection I wish to say that 30 States of the American Union have already ratified the income-tax amendment to our Constitution, and the affirmative voice of but five others is needed to make it a part of our organic law, and I firmly believe and confidently predict that before many months longer that amendment will be ratified. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

From a properly adjusted income tax we can readily secure one hundred million a year, and even more if necessary, and in levying such a tax we will not only carry out Democratic principles, but will subserve the wisest policy of statesmanship by placing at least a portion of the burdens of Government upon the backs of those who are best able to bear them, and who receive a large portion of its benefits.

From a duty on luxuries or on articles that are either entirely noncompetitive, or practically so, we could easily raise the remainder of the revenue necessary to administer economically and effectually the Federal Government.

Let me call your attention to the following table of articles entirely or largely noncompetitive, the figures therein being from the Statistical Abstract of the United States for the year 1909:

The total imports, free and dutiable, in 1909 amounted to $1,312,000,000; the articles dutiable amounted to $712,000,000; the articles free amounted to $599,500,000. The tariff law of 1909 enlarged the free list. The noncompetitive articles amounted to $581,426,000; the revenue produced by the dutiable list in 1909 amounted to $300,977,438, or an equivalent ad valorem rate of 42 per cent.

Applying this rate to the noncompetitive list the probable revenue would be approximately $245,000,000; the revenue in 1910 was approximately $328,000,000.

Applying the principle of taxing noncompetitive imports a deficit of $80,000,000 would probably follow, which could easily be met by several other forms of taxation.

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

Mr. KENDALL. Is the gentleman from Georgia in favor of establishing a tariff on tea and coffee for revenue purposes?

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman, of course, asks me a question that is entitled to a candid answer, and I will endeavor to give it to him. Yes, I favor it and will vote for it with pleasure, either now or later, provided you take the duties entirely off competitive products and adopt the system of duties on luxuries and noncompetitive products. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. KENDALL. Then, if the gentleman had the power in the House he would abolish all——

Mr. HARDWICK. Speaking for myself alone, I would say yes.

Mr. KENDALL. Is that to be the policy of the Democratic Party?

Mr. HARDWICK. The gentleman will have to form his own conclusion about the policy of the Democratic Party. If the Democratic Party does right, then, in my judgment, that will be its ultimate policy on this question. It is the only intelligent policy of this tariff question, unless you are going to embrace protection.

Mr. KENDALL. I inquired of the gentleman, because I believe him to be in the confidence of that party.

Mr. HARDWICK. And I hope I am, and yet on this question I would not undertake to speak for anybody on earth except for myself and the constituency I represent upon this floor. Of course I would not support, and I think I was the first man in this House two years ago to protest against the imposition of a tax on coffee, so long as we were pursuing the system of raising our revenues principally from competitive products. We can not and ought not to adopt both policies on this question, because they are antagonistic to each other and are diametrically opposite in principle. My own idea is that we ought to raise as much as we can from the income tax, from internal-revenue duties, and then ought to supplement it, so far as may be necessary, by moderate tariff duties on noncompetitive products exclusively, and a still higher revenue tax on articles of strict luxury.

Why levy our duties on noncompetitive products except in case of luxuries alone? It is undoubtedly true that whenever we levy duties on competitive products that for every dollar which reaches our customhouses at least $5 in indirect protection goes into the pockets of domestic manufacturers and producers, never reaches the customhouse at all, and yet most grievously burdens and oppresses our people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

On this subject, let me call your attention to a striking statement made during the progress of the debate when the Payne tariff bill was under consideration. It was made by that distinguished gentleman who is now Speaker of this House, Hon. CHAMP CLARK of Missouri. Mr. CLARK said:

> I will tell you the truth about revenue tariff and protective tariff very briefly. Up to a certain point on any article that is made in the United States, as well as abroad, a tariff rate is both a revenue rate and a protective rate, and no human being ever had or can have the ingenuity to separate them. It is an impossibility in nature. For instance, I might say that I am in favor of putting a 25-cent rate on a certain article for the purpose of revenue, and my friend from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] might say that he is in favor of putting a 25-cent rate on the same thing as protection. The upshot of it would be that I would get my revenue and the gentleman from Michigan would get his protection, whether I wanted him to have it or not.

Mr. CLARK states the case well and he states it truly. If the gentleman from Michigan stands on the Republican side and votes for a duty of $2 per thousand on lumber and calls it "protection," and if a gentleman stands on this side of the Chamber and votes for $2 per thousand on lumber and calls it "revenue," what difference does it make to the man who pays the bill? Does the rose by another name smell more or less sweet?

As long as we pursue this system of levying tariff duties on competitive articles we are forced, in order to raise the necessary revenues, to grant a vast amount of "protection," and to impose a still vaster amount of burden upon the American consumer, and therefore, I say, if we want to really lighten that burden, if we are really in earnest in our professed desire to lower the cost of living, if we really wish to present to the American people an issue that goes to the very heart of the matter and involves a great principle upon which legislation can be fashioned and an economic system built, then let us abandon this system of imposing duties on competitive articles and obtain our revenue entirely from noncompetitive articles, the sole exception being in the case of luxuries.

My construction of the time-worn battle cry of our party, "A tariff for revenue only," may not be the conventional one, but it is, I believe, the one that sound statesmanship suggests. As I interpret that phrase, "only" is not an adverb of purpose, but is an adverb of effect, and duties should be laid not only for the sole purpose of obtaining revenue, but so as to have no other effect except to raise revenue.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the views I have expressed may not meet with the approval of every gentleman, even on my own side of the Chamber. I do not expect it. In expressing them I speak, as I have stated before, for no one on earth except myself and my own constituency, but to that extent I assume for them entire responsibility. I do not think any party will ever raise an issue with "protection" that is worth two seconds of the time of the American people until it comes to the position that it will levy no tariff duties except on luxuries and noncompetitive articles, and will supplement those duties with the internal-revenue duties and an income tax. [Loud applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CURLEY].

Mr. CURLEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise to pledge my unqualified support in behalf of this measure as an advanced economic policy of vital interest to the American consumer and as a direct step taken to break down the control of the trusts which, thriving under a protective-tariff policy, are plundering the people of the land.

Broadly and truthfully stated, what does this free-list bill promise the wage earner? It means a loss of some $10,000,000 a year in the revenues of the United States Government, but it means a saving of some $300,000,000 a year to the consumers who buy the articles included in this bill and from which an unjust tax will be removed. And the price, in my judgment, is indeed small to pay, considering the burden lifted from the backs of men engaged in most laborious occupations.

I stand as a bitter and unrelenting foe of the Republican Party, because under its economic policy it does not make all men of this Nation equal before the law.

And our Republican friends, in the face of the November elections, return here to again repeat their assumption and rest their case upon the miserable economic theory that wages are increased by tariff taxation, their favorite and only ground for argument addressed in support of restricted trade.

The wages of this country depend upon supply and demand. There is absolutely no trade in labor that can be protected and busy artisans move about the country unscheduled in tariffs. And to the wretched sophistry that taxation under a protective tariff increases wages, the best reply is found in the fact that there is a free trade in labor, a closed and monopolized market in the products of labor, and which labor must buy to live upon. Labor sells its service in a free-trade market and is paid in the necessaries of life, advanced beyond all reason in price by a protective tariff and the trusts sheltered by the tariff. These trusts control competition from abroad, kill competition among themselves by price agreements, and up to the very highest limit that the consumer can stand.

The people of this country believe that free raw materials will help them and their industries; they so declared last November, and they have the power in this House to make their will into law and to defeat any petty spirit of revenge.

Within these hallowed walls the hour of a new dispensation is at hand.

It is the producer of the land who will benefit by the passage of this measure. Agricultural implements will cost our farmers approximately about $14,000,000 less. The southern planters will save $9,000,000 a year on their bagging, ties, and sacks, and the Lumber Trust will be compelled to suffer a reduction of revenue of about $60,000,000 a year in the passage of this bill. Upon leather, boots and shoes, saddles and harnesses the saving to the American people will be $37,000,000 a year.

The trusts of the country producing the articles named in this bill will cease riding upon the back of the Government at will to stupendous profits by the strangling of competition. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The Republican Party, year after year, has made its bargains with the trusts' interests of the country, frying out the fat of bloated corporations and then distributing their money and securing votes in return for measures that have laid the heavy hand of taxation upon the people, not primarily for revenue nor for government but to add to the gigantic wealth of special interests. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Under this benign protective policy the Republican Party loves the American workman when the votes are coming in and the protected manufacturer when the bills are coming in. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The object of this free-list bill is to help destroy the principle of government that the many must suffer in order to enrich the few.

I say to you, my friends, let us rise and remove the heavy burden of taxation and give our farmers and artisans an equal chance in life, and the money wrung from them to fill the coffers of great trusts and combinations of capital will go for a better and a happier living, the enjoyment of a greater comfort to the people of our land, and the wages earned in varied employments will go for the better support of the families, the enjoyment in a small measure of some of those pleasures that are incident to the possession of means, and for the better education of their children.

The northern and southern farmer as well are praying for relief from an inequitable burden of taxation and are eagerly expecting some means of relief from the Sixty-second Congress as the result of their voice expressed at the polls in November last. The Democratic principle is: That imports coming in competition with trust-controlled products should be placed upon the free list and articles of absolute necessity should be imported free of duty. The Republican Party has reached its extreme outpost under its last tariff measure.

For the Government gets $1 of revenue while the trusts take $7 out of the pocket of the consumer.

The trust system of this country, of which the Republican Party is the master, belongs to monarchy and feudalism, and it has no valid part or lot in a government built upon the affirmation of all men as free and equal.

The saving that will come to the consumers of the country by the passage of this measure will be stupendous. We find the farmers producing the very things upon which the people of this land subsist, and at every hand their means of production is burdened by the exactions of an oppressive Republican tariff policy largely dictated by the trust barons.

And every revolt against the Republican Party, as indicated by the honest and courageous men upon the floor of this House who bear the title of "insurgents," leaves the party more and more in the clutches of evil influence.

Trust magnates are made the patrons of an exorbitant tariff; they grow rich beyond the dreams of avarice, and the voice of an outraged Nation that the necessaries of life shall be made cheaper falls upon deaf and unresponsive ears.

This economic system places the burden upon the many for the benefit of the few, for without the present extravagant tariff there never could have been the vast accumulation of wealth by the trusts of the country.

Never in the world's history were the ringing words of the great apostle of freedom, William Ewart Gladstone, more true than they are to-day. Gladstone said:

> Conceal the hand of the tax gatherer and you can tax a people to the point of impoverishment, if not starvation, without resistance upon their part.

Remember, my friends, that when an abuse of the legislative power of the country is made to enrich any person it can only be so exercised by the taking of wealth from some one else.

Now, the argument of a protective tariff is that the manufacturer is first enriched and the laborer afterwards. Yet, with a vast number of trusts controlling the products of the land and rolling up millions upon millions, how often do you ever hear of the workmen being called together and given an increase of wages of even a fraction of 1 per cent?

And now what are the actual facts? As a distinguished economist has most well and truly declared:

> After 16 years of Republican rule we find the American laborer working harder and producing more to-day than he ever produced in his life. But he has actually less to eat and wear than he ever had before. And why? Because, my friends, real wages consist of what can be bought with the money received as wages. You can not eat or wear money. You must exchange your money wages for the necessaries of life before you can tell whether wages are high or low.
> The trusts have increased the price of living in this country 60 per cent in 16 years, during which time we find that wages have been either at a standstill or declining.
> The people of this country are becoming so used to the thought of want under the brutal injustice of the trust system that they do not feel that the evil grows greater to the sufferer the longer that it lasts, for it actually becomes less so to the observer by the very fact of its duration.

And in these days of trust domination how eloquent are the words of Daniel Webster at Plymouth Rock, in December, 1820. Webster said:

> A free government can not long endure where the tendency of law is to concentrate the wealth of the country in the hands of the few and render the masses poor and dependent.

That massive intellect, that clear, gray, gleaming eye foresaw 90 years ago the danger of the economic situation as it exists to-day.

Again, at Albany, N. Y., in 1844, Webster declares:

> The culture of the soil is the great leading interest of the country; trade and manufactures should be regarded as subordinate and auxiliary to it. I am willing to admit that if the theory and practice of protection can be shown distinctly to militate against the agricultural interest it ought to be given up.

It is the experience of the world's history that whenever any person is equipped with the power to oppress his fellow men for his own benefit that power will be exercised.

The economic story of the times is that under this form of protective tariff the right to tax—the greatest right and power that the world knows, and which Chief Justice John Marshall declared was the right to destroy—has passed from the Government to individuals and corporations, in defiance of the popular will.

This policy is diametrically opposed to every contention of justice for which the fathers fought and is the sinister shadow resting upon our land to-day.

Give to the American producer free raw materials and by his marvelous skill he can defy competition in every quarter of the earth.

This policy of protection has made the American flag upon the waterways of the world as great a curiosity almost as the behemoth upon land. But this subject is a more appropriate topic for another day to come.

The tariff taxes of this country should be as low as they can be made, for the very reason that, while effective in gathering revenue, the exaction does not fall upon property, but upon consumption. The tariff laid upon the farmer and artisan is a law upon which the poor stand upon an unhappy plane of equality with the rich.

And the law of taxation, as especially applied to the agriculturists of this land, places the small class within the division of the profits of the trusts of the country.

Why, my friends, the policy of a high protective tariff that has been argued upon this floor during the present debate is identically the same economic policy that drove from the ranks of the Republican Party Wendell Phillips, Horace Greeley, Charles Sumner, William Pitt Fessenden, Lyman Trumbull, Henry Ward Beecher, George William Curtis, Alexander K. McClure, Charles A. Dana, James C. Carter, George Hoadley, D. H. Chamberlin, William Lloyd Garrison, jr., James E. Campbell, Francis Parkman, Walter Q. Gresham, Wayne McVeagh, Thomas M. Cooley, John M. Palmer, James Russell Lowell, Benjamin F. Butler, James Freeman Clarke, Carl Schurz, Salmon P. Chase, Hugh McCulloch, Thomas W. Higginson, Francis A. Walker, David Davis, Moorfield Story, Henry L. Pierce, William Everett, and the present governor of Massachusetts, Eugene N. Foss. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. AUSTIN. I will give you some extra time from this side.

Mr. CURLEY. I do not wish to yield at present.

In my candid opinion the heresy of the Republican economic situation has been well and truly defined by a distinguished Massachusetts economist, who has declared that because a township may levy taxes to support the poor there is no principle of justice or common sense that compels it to levy taxes and give them to those persons or things that make the poor.

When we see a Carnegie, an Armour, a Morgan, or a Rockefeller able to both control and enact legislation and exact tribute from the whole people the issue becomes far more vital than one of taxation. It is the right of the people to govern themselves and have the law used for their own purpose. A militant and powerful Democracy demands that this right shall be given back to the people and that laws shall be placed upon the statutes that shall free them from trust influence and corrupt legislation.

And remember that the American people have expressed by their suffrage a protest, country-wide in its extent, against this Republican policy of a tariff measure upon which the trusts wax fat, and that every dollar unnecessarily levied in support of a policy designed to enrich a special class is a dollar taken from the family contingent fund.

Its subtraction under this system of protection means less comfort in the home of the American artisan, less clothes and shoes for the children, and less bread upon the table.

We have witnessed in our manufacturing cities the cottage of the toiler disappear with its beautiful environment and breathing ever and again the sweet story of human affection.

We demand that this Nation and its people shall again enjoy that economic freedom that was made possible under Democratic rule and prosperity in the first 60 years of this Republic's life and that the love of country and its flag borne by our forbears in the spirit of the founders of this Nation shall return and that the right of taxation which governs our people shall not be sold upon the altar of Mammon.

We ask for the American workman only the just return for his wage, a means of relief from the unseen, ruthless hand of the taxgatherer which the trust system of this country fosters under a protective tariff.

For it is the men who have hewed the forests, who have built the homes, the schools, the churches, and the ships, and who have blazed the trail across the great confines of this country that have made civilization possible. Other men have been useful indeed, but it has been the man who labors with his brains and hands who has been largely responsible for the world's development.

This class of men must have justice before the law, their protest has been heard at the polls, and for them and in their behalf we ask naught but economic opportunity and freedom. [Loud applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER].

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Chairman, I hold in my hand a splendidly written article from the pen of Mr. R. M. Gates, the very intelligent and wide-awake Washington correspondent of the Commercial Appeal, published at Memphis, Tenn., which appeared in the issue of that paper of April 30 last. I ask unanimous consent to print it with these remarks in the RECORD. This is the article to which I refer:

HOUSE DEMOCRATS MAKE PROMISES GOOD—PASS RECIPROCITY, CUT EXPENSES, ETC.—PROMISES MUCH FOR 1912—CHAMP CLARK READILY ACCEDED TO CURTAILMENT OF SPEAKER'S POWER—WILL UNDERTAKE INVESTIGATION OF ALL PARTS OF GOVERNMENT.

[By R. M. Gates.]

WASHINGTON, April 29, 1911.

The Democrats of the lower House of the Sixty-second Congress have made an auspicious beginning. They are keeping the faith; they are vindicating the splendid majority by which control of the House was transferred from the Republican to the Democratic Party. They are doing things in an orderly way and without that harshness and friction which the Republicans had hoped and prophesied would mark Democratic domination of the House. No Democratic House ever accomplished more in the way of practical legislation in an equal length of time, and, unless the unexpected supervenes to change the trend of things, the Democratic majority in the House of Representatives will make history of the highest character for the presidential campaign of 1912, in which year even a greater Democratic triumph than that of last November will probably be recorded. Unquestionably things are moving along smoothly in the House as far as the Democrats are concerned. While there was at the beginning of the session some soreness on the part of those Democrats whose patronage plans went awry because of the new rules under which political favors are being dispensed, no Democrat thus far disappointed has sought to create a disturbance. The patronage question is still unsettled in some minor particulars, but as the machinery of the working organization steadies there will be an adjusting of all the parts.

TOOK POWER FROM SPEAKER.

The last congressional campaign was waged along certain well-defined lines of reform, not only with reference to a reformation of the rules of the House, but with respect to matters of vital legislation, notably the tariff. Some time before the Sixty-second Congress was convened in extra session the Democrats of the House met in caucus and agreed that certain important reforms in House procedure should be put into practice. The most radical departure from the old order of things was to take the appointment of committees from the Speaker and lodge that power with the Committee on Ways and Means, which was also constituted the committee on committees. The people had been promised this reform as a far step in the direction of thwarting what had become known as personal legislation, or legislation directed by the Speaker. The Democrats promised to take the appointment of committees from the Speaker before the November election, and after that contest, by which a Republican majority was changed to a Democratic majority in the House, the Republicans declared that the proposed reform would not be vitalized, because CHAMP CLARK, whose promotion to the Speakership was practically settled in advance of the election, would demand that he be allowed to retain all the power that had made his predecessors invincible. But the Republicans were poor profits. Assured of his election as Speaker, Mr. CLARK readily subscribed to the reform by which he, as the presiding officer of the House, would not enjoy the privilege of assigning committee places. Under the new order of things Speaker CLARK is the presiding officer of the House, and nothing more. It has been facetiously observed that all the Speaker has left is the gavel.

CUT EXPENDITURES.

Another important reform which the Democrats promised the country and which they made haste to put into effect was a curtailment of expenditures in connection with the Capitol and the conduct of the business of the various departments. The first part of that promise is already a fact and the second part may be regarded as a near fact. The first official swing of the ax lopped off an annual expense of approximately $183,000, which, under Republican control of the House, had been paid to useless employees about the Capitol. For example, at the beginning of our trouble with Spain a wild rumor of a "dastardly conspiracy" to blow up the Capitol swept the Republican side of the House of Representatives. Instantly 35 additional guards were given service in the great building. These police recruits were brought from Republican districts as a reward for political favors, and remained on the Government pay roll until the Democrats organized the present House. Moreover, clerks had been appointed to committees which never held a meeting. The Democrats could not see why useless policemen and clerks should be retained on the pay roll simply because they found them there when they took control of affairs at the House end of the Capitol.

PASS RECIPROCITY.

Freer trade relations with Canada has been agitated by both Democrats and liberal Republicans for years, but under the Cannon régime there was no chance to break the shackles which American tariff barons had placed upon the arms of commerce. President Taft tried it the first year of his administration and failed. The Democrats made it one of the issues in the congressional campaign, promising closer trade relations with Canada if the people would place them in control of the House. What they have done toward the redemption of that pledge is the most interesting chapter yet written by the Democrats of the House of the Sixty-second Congress. The treaty which President Taft negotiated with Canada was put up to them, and they in turn have put it squarely up to the Senate, after giving it their enthusiastic indorsement. Another important pledge to the country was then fulfilled. What the Republican Senate is going to do is a matter for speculation. Surface indications are that the treaty will be accepted, but not without a long and hard struggle. If the Senate rejects the Canadian reciprocity proposition, it will mean the beginning of the end of President Taft's aspirations to succeed himself in the White House. * * *

WILL PASS FARMERS' FREE LIST.

Still another great reform promised by the Democrats was to revise the important schedules of the Payne-Aldrich protective tariff law. Not only will the Democrats of the House revise the vicious woolen and cotton schedules, but they will pass what they have labeled as their "farmers' free-list bill." This bill seeks to place upon the free list agricultural implements, mechanics' tools, and many articles of food of common consumption. This bill will draw the full fire of the protectionist forces in both Houses, and it is by no means certain that President Taft would sign the bill if it should get to him. At any rate, the Democratic House is going to put the issue up to the Senate and the Executive.

WHOLESALE INVESTIGATION.

A searching investigation into the various departments of Government will be undertaken at the instance of the Democratic majority in the House. Committees charged with the conduct of these investigations have been appointed, and soon the light will be turned on in full force. That there is "something rotten in Denmark" is beyond dispute, and the Democrats are going to locate the malodorous odor. There has not been an investigation of some of the departments in nearly 20 years, so the timeliness of the proposed looking into things is apparent.

In view of what they have already done and what they propose to accomplish, the Democrats of the House feel that they will convince the country of their capacity for still greater achievement with the cooperation of a Democratic Senate and Democratic President.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ALEXANDER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 4413—the free-list bill—and had come to no resolution thereon.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. PALMER, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Alton E. Cobb, Sixtieth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, May 4, 1911, at 11 o'clock a. m.

APPROPRIATIONS INCIDENT TO THE SESSION.

Mr. WARREN. From the Committee on Appropriations I report back favorably with an amendment the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 2) making appropriations for the payment of certain expenses incident to the first session of the Sixty-second Congress, and I submit a report (No. 2) thereon. I ask for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the joint resolution for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the joint resolution.

Mr. WARREN. The House simply submitted the portion that belongs to that body and the amendment offered by the Senate committee refers to the corresponding offices of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment of the committee will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, after line 5, insert:

SENATE.

For compensation of officers, clerks, messengers, and others in the service of the Senate, namely: Sixteen pages for the Senate Chamber, at the rate of $2.50 per day each during the session, from April 4 to June 30, 1911, $3,520, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

For stationery for committees and officers of the Senate, $1,000.

In lieu of the unexpended balance of the appropriation for "compiler of the Navy Yearbook and indexer for Senate public documents, Pitman Pulsifer," for the fiscal year 1911, and the amount appropriated for "compiler of Navy Yearbook and indexer for Senate public documents, Pitman Pulsifer," for the fiscal year 1912, there shall be made available so much of the sum of said unexpended balance and appropriation as may be necessary for the payment of salary to the person or persons designated by the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate to perform such work of compiling and indexing. And the unexpended balance of the sum of $6,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, appropriated for "compiling and indexing reports and hearings when necessary of Senate committees and joint committees of the Senate and House of Representatives under Pitman Pulsifer, indexer," in the urgent deficiency act approved December 23, 1910, shall also be expended for such work of compiling and indexing under the direction of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BACON. I do not ask that the joint resolution be reread, but I should like to know what is the nature of the expenses that are included.

Mr. WARREN. It provides on the House side for their pages and certain messengers the per diem until the 30th of June. It provides for the pages of this body until the 30th of June. As passed by the House it provides stationery for the House, to which we do not add anything for the Senate except $1,000 for general stationery, occasioned by the new adjustment of committees.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time and passed.

MILEAGE APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. WARREN. From the Committee on Appropriations I report back favorably, without amendment, the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 3) making immediately available the appropriations for mileage of Senators and of Members of the House of Representatives, and I submit a report (No. 1) thereon. I ask for its present consideration.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CORRECTION OF ERRORS IN APPROPRIATION ACTS.

Mr. WARREN. I also report back favorably from the Committee on Appropriations, with amendments, the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 1) to correct the errors in the enrollment of certain appropriation acts approved March 4, 1911, and I submit a report (No. 3) thereon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming ask for its present consideration?

Mr. WARREN. I ask for its present consideration. I may state in explanation that the amendments propose to strike out the preamble and to change the title of the joint resolution.

Mr. HEYBURN. I object to its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made to the present consideration of the joint resolution, and it will go to the calendar.

TEMPORARY STRUCTURES IN POTOMAC PARK.

Mr. CULLOM. From the Committee on Foreign Relations I report back favorably without amendment the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 38) to grant authority to the American Red Cross to erect temporary structures in Potomac Park, Washington, D. C., for which I ask present consideration. This joint resolution has already passed the House.

The Secretary read the joint resolution; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HEARINGS BEFORE DISTRICT COMMITTEE.

Mr. BRIGGS. From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, I report back favorably Senate resolution 16, submitted by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] on the 13th ultimo, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The resolution was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia, or any subcommittee thereof, be authorized to send for persons and papers and to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be pending before said committee; that the committee may sit during the sessions or recesses of the Senate, and that the expense thereof be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

HEARINGS BEFORE COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS.

Mr. BRIGGS, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred Senate resolution 20, submitted by Mr. WARREN on the 17th ultimo, reported it without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs, or any subcommittee thereof, be authorized to send for persons and papers and to administer oaths and to employ a stenographer to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be pending before said committee, and to have the same printed for its use; that the committee may sit during the sessions or recesses of the Senate, and that the expense thereof be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

HEARINGS BEFORE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY.

Mr. BRIGGS, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred Senate resolution 22, submitted by Mr. CLARK of Wyoming on the 20th ultimo, reported it without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary, or any subcommittee thereof, be authorized, during the Sixty-second Congress, to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, to employ a stenographer to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject that may be pending before said committee, and to have such hearings printed for the use of the committee; that the expenses of such hearings be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate; and that the said committee and all subcommittees thereof may sit during the sessions of the Senate.

INVESTIGATIONS BY COMMITTEE ON FINANCE.

Mr. BRIGGS. From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, I report back Senate resolution 28, submitted by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] on the 1st instant, and I ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed, by subcommittee or otherwise, to make investigations of internal-revenue, customs, currency, and coinage matters, and to compile and prepare statistics and documents relating thereto as directed from time to time by the Senate and as may be necessary, and to report from time to time to the Senate the result thereof; and for this purpose they are authorized to sit, by subcommittee or otherwise, during the recess or sessions of the Senate, at such times and places as they may deem advisable, to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ such stenographic, clerical, and other assistance as may be necessary, the expense of such investigation to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate; and the committee is authorized to order such printing and binding as may be necessary for its use.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I should like to ask if the resolution does not duplicate the work of the Monetary Commission and the work of the Tariff Commission. If it does, I desire to object. It seems to me that it does duplicate much of the work that those commissions are now doing.

Mr. PENROSE. There is, of course, no intention of duplicating the work of the Monetary Commission or the Tariff Commission. This is the usual resolution offered at the beginning of every Congress in relation to the Finance Committee. For the last 15 years, I believe, a resolution similar to this one has been passed by the Senate, and it is absolutely necessary in view of the many directions made by the Senate to that committee. The Senate has already directed the committee to compile a number of documents involving great labor, and it is work requiring accuracy and expert knowledge. Without some such authority the committee will be absolutely at a standstill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon object to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not, unless it duplicates the work of those commissions.

Mr. PENROSE. There is absolutely no such intention.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

SENATOR FROM ILLINOIS.

Mr. BRIGGS. From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate I report back Senate resolution 6, submitted by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] on the 6th ultimo, and referred to the committee on the 1st instant, and I submit a report (No. 4) thereon; I ask that the resolution and the report be read.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Whereas the Senate by resolution adopted on the 20th day of June, 1910, authorized and directed the Committee on Privileges and Elections to investigate certain charges against WILLIAM LORIMER, a Senator from the State of Illinois, and to report to the Senate whether in the election of said LORIMER as a Senator of the United States from said State of Illinois there were used and employed corrupt methods and practices; and

Whereas said committee, pursuant to said resolution, took the testimony of a large number of witnesses, reduced the testimony to printed form, and reported the same to the Senate, which was thereafter considered and acted upon by the Senate; and

Whereas the Illinois State senate thereafter appointed a committee to investigate like charges against WILLIAM LORIMER and to report to said State senate whether in the election of said LORIMER to the United States Senate corrupt methods and practices were employed and used; and

Whereas as it appears from the published reports of the proceedings of the said Illinois State senate committee that witnesses who were not called and sworn by the committee of this Senate appointed to investigate said charges have appeared before the said committee of the Illinois State senate, and upon being interrogated have given important material testimony tending to prove that $100,000 was corruptly expended to secure the election of WILLIAM LORIMER to the United States Senate:

Resolved, That Senators JOHN D. WORKS, CHARLES E. TOWNSEND, GEORGE P. MCLEAN, JOHN W. KERN, and ATLEE POMERENE be, and they are hereby, appointed a special committee, and as such committee be, and are hereby, authorized and directed to investigate and report to the Senate whether in the election of WILLIAM LORIMER, as a Senator of the United States from the State of Illinois, there were used and employed corrupt methods and practices; that said committee be authorized to sit during the sessions of the Senate and during any recess of the Senate or of Congress, to hold sessions at such place or places as it shall deem most convenient for the purposes of the investigation, to employ stenographers, to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, and to report the results of its investigation, including all testimony taken by it; and that the expenses of the inquiry shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers to be approved by the chairman of the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the report as follows:

Mr. BRIGGS, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, submitted the following report to accompany the resolution (S. Res. 6):

This resolution is reported to the Senate by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate with a favorable recommendation. In making this recommendation the committee disclaims any purpose to indicate whether the investigation should be made by the standing Committee on Privileges and Elections or by the special committee whose membership is named in the resolution, or whether the investigation should be made at all; those matters being left, as they must be left, to the future action of the Senate, but intends by its action to provide the money necessary for this investigation if an investigation be made.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE, Mr. DILLINGHAM, and Mr. BRIGGS addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I request that the resolution lie upon the table, to be called up by me for consideration by the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin objects to the present consideration of the resolution and asks that it lie on the table.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. My request, of course, makes objection in another form.

Mr. BRIGGS. If the Chair will pardon me, I wish to say that the request which I made was that the resolution be read, and after it had been read I did not intend to ask that it be now considered, but that it go to the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wisconsin that the resolution lie on the table? The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I would like at this time, Mr. President, to give notice that early in the next week I shall ask the Senate to consider the resolution, at which time I shall submit some information to the Senate and some observations upon the importance of passing the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will remain on the table, subject to call.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, a large number of Senators on both sides of the Chamber have suggested that, in view of the work that is before the committees of the Senate, it would be well to adjourn over until Monday next. I notice that there are two measures on the calendar. I want to ask the Senators interested in those measures whether they will object to a motion for an adjournment until Monday?

Mr. BORAH. I will say, in answer to the Senator from New Hampshire, that if we could have the second number upon the calendar, House joint resolution 39, made the unfinished business, I would not object to adjournment until Monday, but I should like to have that disposed of and made the unfinished business before the matter of adjourning over is finally concluded.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I will inquire by what method the Senator proposes to make the joint resolution to which he refers the unfinished business? It can not be done at this hour under any rule of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It can be done by unanimous consent at this time, but in no other possible way.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not think that we can make it the unfinished business by unanimous consent. Unfinished business is an automatic proposition. A bill or resolution becomes unfinished business because of the position it has occupied on the calendar.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield, Mr. President.

Mr. LODGE. As to the matter of the unfinished business, I wish to say that unfinished business is created by motion to take up a measure at a certain hour, and, of course, the Senate can make a measure the unfinished business by unanimous consent. We can suspend the rules; we can do anything, practically, by unanimous consent. I have seen here, I should say many times, agreements entered into to make a certain measure the unfinished business at 2 o'clock. That is simply making the motion out of order; that is all.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is not written in any rule of the Senate that we can make any measure the unfinished business——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. I want merely to finish the expression. I am not going to discuss this matter, but I intend to interpose such opposition as I may properly interpose under the rules of the Senate against making any measure the unfinished business by a resolution or by any unanimous-consent agreement that does not take up the measure. It can not become unfinished business until it has been taken up.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Senator objects, that is the end of the proposition.

Mr. HEYBURN. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho objects.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Without reference to whether or not the joint resolution can in this manner be made the unfinished business, Mr. President, I desire to say to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] that some of the members of the Committee on the Judiciary desire to file their views in writing with reference to the joint resolution. There has hardly yet been opportunity for them to get together, and therefore I hope that no attempt will be made to bring the joint resolution formally before the Senate as the unfinished business until that can be done, which will be in the very near future.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Idaho, then, in view of the suggestion made by the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, if he will let this matter go over until Monday?

Mr. BORAH. If that is the desire of the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, of course I will do so; but I did not understand that the chairman desired that. He only desired that no formal action be taken such as will necessitate a vote. If, however, the chairman desires that the request shall go over until Monday, I will not object.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then, Mr. President, I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. BAILEY. I move that until otherwise ordered the daily sessions of the Senate shall begin at 2 o'clock post meridian.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas moves that until otherwise ordered the hour of daily meeting of the Senate be 2 o'clock p. m. The question is on that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE OF THE SENATE.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry. Some 10 days ago the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] submitted his resignation as President pro tempore of the Senate. I ask whether any action has been taken by the Senate on that resignation?

The VICE PRESIDENT. No action has been taken thereon.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I desire to say to the Senator that during the present week there will be a conference on the part of Republican Senators on that question.

CONSTITUTIONS OF ARIZONA AND NEW MEXICO.

Mr. BROWN. I desire to call from the table Senate joint resolution 2 and to have it referred to the Committee on Territories. It is the joint resolution approving the constitutions of Arizona and New Mexico.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska asks that the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 2) approving the constitutions formed by the constitutional conventions of the Territory of New Mexico and the Territory of Arizona be referred to the Committee on Territories. In the absence of objection, that reference will be made.

REFORMS IN REPRESENTATIVE GOVERNMENT.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, a few days ago the Attorney General of the United States delivered an address at Princeton criticizing as a "spasmodic intervention" of a "popular uprising" some of the reforms that are now in vogue. I desire to submit an editorial from the Baltimore Sun in reference to that matter, and I ask to have the Secretary read it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary proceeded to read the editorial.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I was temporarily absent from the Chamber when the reading of this document commenced. I am unable, from anything I have heard since returning, to ascertain that it is in any way proper to be read in the Senate, and I object to its further reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The reading was permitted by unanimous consent, and the Chair supposes when unanimous consent has been given that the reading should be concluded. It is nearly concluded anyway.

Mr. HEYBURN. I was not here, and I am desirous of knowing how this extraneous matter came before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The matter came before the Senate at the request of the Senator from Oregon, who asked unanimous consent that it be read, and that consent was granted.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not know what is in it——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oregon stated, in making his request, that it was an editorial from the Baltimore Sun relating to a certain subject.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I suggest, Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. I hope the Senate will adopt a new rule in regard to allowing things to be read by unanimous consent without having knowledge whether it is from the Pentateuch or the Arabian Nights.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I suggest, inasmuch as the distinguished Senator from Idaho did not hear it, he ought to read the editorial.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will conclude the reading.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the editorial, which is as follows:

NOT TO DESTROY BUT TO RESTORE REPRESENTATIVE GOVERNMENT.

[From the Baltimore Sun, May 3, 1911.]

Attorney General Wickersham apparently fails to appreciate either the force or the spirit of the progressive movement. His address at Princeton indicates that his views have in nowise changed since he went to Chicago a year ago to administer his rebuke to the Republican insurgents. He seems to regard genuine reform proposals as the "spasmodic intervention" of a "popular uprising." He resents proper criticism as "heckling and misrepresentation," and fears that it will make competent men hesitate before they undertake public service. He does not appreciate the fact that the tendency of the people to hold their servants to a stricter accountability is because their confidence has so often been misplaced. His objection to the multiplicity of laws is well founded, and most of us will agree with him that we are a "law-ridden people." Too many laws are passed and two few enforced. But legislation must keep pace with changing conditions, and the sudden growth of vast corporations, absorbing most of the business of the country in many lines, demands regulation, and the Attorney General, in his able arguments before the Supreme Court in the Tobacco and Oil Trust cases, has ably set forth this necessity.

But is he justified in denouncing as "demagogy" the proposed changes in the Constitution? There are only two such propositions now before the American people. One is to enable the Federal Government to levy a tax on incomes. The resolution proposing it was adopted by Congress upon the urgent recommendation of President Taft, and is to remove doubt from a power that it was believed the Government possessed until the Supreme Court surprised the country by declaring, by a mere majority vote, the income-tax clause of the Wilson tariff law unconstitutional. The Attorney General himself had a hand in drawing the provision of the Payne-Aldrich Act that levies a tax on corporations. The other proposition is for the election of United States Senators by direct popular vote. This is not a blow at representative government, as Mr. Wickersham would have us believe, but an attempt to restore it. For the past 20 years, the progressives contend, the Senate has not represented the people. Many Senators who could never have been elected by popular vote have been chosen by legislatures amenable to "influence." Deadlocks have been frequent and have prevented legislatures from attending to their business. Scandals have been frequent and bribery by no means uncommon. Such cases as that of LORIMER have severely shaken confidence in the present method of electing Senators, and there is little doubt that the preponderance of thoughtful sentiment favors the proposed change.

Mr. Wickersham will find that the vast majority hold with Woodrow Wilson that "we, the people, have not free enough access to our own agents or direct enough control over them." Gov. Wilson states clearly the purpose of the progressives when he says, "We are cutting away anomalies, not institutions; we are clearing away the jungle and letting in the pure light and air, not destroying the wholesome forces or creating waste places where there was productive growth."

The effort of the progressives of both parties, and those of no party at all, is not to tear down, but to build up; not to cumber the statute books with more laws, but to simplify those we have and displace obsolete laws with new legislation that experience shows is necessary to cope with changed conditions, and to remedy defects in the governmental machinery. "By one means or another," says Gov. Wilson, "the Governments actually have been deprived of their representative character. They do not represent us." He sets forth the position of the true progressives—and they are rapidly becoming the most numerous element in both parties—which is not to destroy representative government, but to make our Government more truly representative.

RULINGS OF POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that on the 6th day of April I offered a resolution (S. Res. 10), which the Senate adopted, that the Postmaster General be required to furnish certain information as to why he discriminated against certain newspapers, notably the Woman's National Weekly. Thirty days have elapsed since the adoption of that resolution and yet Mr. Hitchcock, the Postmaster General, has paid no attention to it.

I want to know if Mr. Hitchcock is bigger than the Senate of the United States. He has set on foot a diabolical, deliberate effort which has resulted in the ruin of Mr. Lewis, the editor of the Woman's National Weekly. The methods that have been employed by Mr. Hitchcock and his subordinates are the most despicable, indeed, and call for the severest condemnation not only of the Senate but of the country itself. They have absolutely hounded this man from Maine to California, and have cut off 103,000 valid, paid subscribers. They have destroyed his property. They have bankrupted the man, destroyed his bank, all under governmental sanction and governmental authority; and when the Senate of the United States calls for simple, plain information as to why it is done, Mr. Hitchcock turns up his nose and refuses to answer.

I say I want to know if Mr. Hitchcock is bigger than the Senate of the United States, and I want to serve notice on him now that if this resolution is not answered by to-day a week I am going to offer a resolution in the Senate condemning him as a public servant and asking the Senate to request the President of the United States to discharge him from the public service. Now I hope he will get busy.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I think we ought to have an executive session, and I therefore move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 12 o'clock and 58 minutes p. m) the Senate adjourned until Monday, May 8, 1911, at 2 o'clock p. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, May 4, 1911.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., as follows:

Blessed be the name of the Lord, our God, whose glory shines around about us with ever increasing brightness and whose mercy is from everlasting to everlasting, poured out in a thousand blessings anew every morning and fresh every evening. Help us by the rectitude of our behavior and with unswerving devotion to duty to prove ourselves worthy of such love and devotion. And Thine be the praise, through Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE TARIFF.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 4413, a bill to put agricultural implements and other articles on the free list.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. ALEXANDER in the chair.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON]. [Applause.]

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Chairman, without indorsing or criticizing his address, for I have seen a newspaper account only of it, let me say that no truer or more timely expression was ever uttered than that attributed to Hon. Woodrow Wilson when he said, at Norfolk, Va., a few days ago that—

> Programs are taking the place of philippics; and programs can be soberly examined and assessed, as unqualified criticisms and denunciations can not be.

I believe that it is but just to say that this Democratic House has furnished a conspicuous example of the truth of that assertion. For whatever questions which may have heretofore divided Democrats, it must be admitted, as a subject for Democratic felicitation at least, that the Democratic Party here has determined to bring about a reduction of import duties and a reform of the tariff system, and that to this end the majority is living up to a definite program. [Applause on the Democratic side.] That program is in harmony, as we must believe, with the latest expressed will of the majority of the American people. The program and the action under it were brought about because the people have evidenced the fact that they are no longer to be deceived by the false teachings of the Republican Party and are at the same time disgusted with the broken promises of some of its trusted leaders made before elections and for the purpose of gaining votes to keep that party in power. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The people have determined to control the Government according to the will of the majority and for the benefit of all, rather than in the interest of the few who profit by inequitable laws. The presence of the Democratic majority in this House attests the truthfulness of this statement, and it is not too much to hope that Republican economic heresies and Republican bad faith will be further condemned next year by the election of some great Democrat to the high office of President. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

FURTHER DEMOCRATIC OPPORTUNITY.

It is not necessary to admonish the Democrats here or elsewhere to continue to assert simple and admitted Democratic principles and to continue to endeavor to put these principles into law and practice whenever and wherever possible. The courage and unanimity of action, and the action itself, that have characterized the conduct of the majority of this House during the last 30 days have pleased the disciples of Thomas Jefferson everywhere and given new emphasis to the old faith that in government there ought to be "equal rights to all and special privileges to none," and that there "must be economy in the public expenditures that labor may be lightly burdened." [Applause on the Democratic side.] The Democratic Party has been triumphant when it demanded retrenchment and reform and has succeeded in two presidential elections in late years when it fearlessly proclaimed that a tariff law is a tax law, and that neither a tariff tax nor any other kind of a tax should be levied except for the support of the Government in all of its vigor and under economical and honest administration. It is not to be controverted that no patriotic man objects to paying taxes for the support of the Government. And it is equally true that every right-thinking man ought to admit that any system of taxation designed to favor individual or special interests and not for public revenue is an abuse of the taxing power of the Government, and therefore a vicious system.

Who is it that will justify the conferring of special benefits under the form of tax laws upon favorites at the expense of the masses—the masses from whom must be exacted the legitimate expenses of the organization and maintenance of the Government and the masses who must furnish the money bestowed upon the favorites by these laws? It is forever fundamentally true that taxation is not, never was, and never can be a productive force in any organized society; rather it is subtractive from the taxpayers and necessary and justifiable for the sole reason that it is essential for public governmental purposes. And this Democratic House can do its part in honest endeavor to observe these correct principles in legislation affecting the tariff.

RESPECTIVE POSITIONS OF THE REPUBLICAN AND DEMOCRATIC PARTIES.

It is difficult to define the present attitude of the Republican Party with respect to the tariff. In this House that historical party is divided into two hostile camps, known in the common parlance here as standpatters and insurgents. And the same division obtains in another distinguished body which I am, perhaps, precluded by the rules of the House from mentioning by name. In this Chamber that party recently evidenced a decided division in respect to the Canadian reciprocity trade agreement, for on the vote on that measure 60 Republicans voted with the Democrats to approve and 80 Republicans voted to disapprove that agreement, which was negotiated by the Republican President and proposed by him to the Congress. This was done in the face of repeated Republican platform declarations in favor of reciprocal trade agreements, and if the indications are borne out there will be a division in the Republican ranks when the pending bill is passed. I shall not impugn the motives of any Republican, but I hazard the prediction that the next Republican platform will at once declare for protection and for some sort of tariff reform, so that the next tariff utterance of that party will be an artistic straddle, designed to fool some people, just as their last platform sought to do when it declared—unequivocally for the revision of the tariff by special session of the Congress immediately following the inauguration of the next President.

And also said at the same time that—

In all tariff legislation the true principle of protection is best maintained by the imposition of such duties as will equal the difference between cost of production at home and abroad, together with a reasonable profit to American industries.

It has been ascertained that the cost of production of American manufactures is, as a rule, not greater than the cost of production of similar manufactures in foreign countries, because of the superior skill and efficiency, machinery, and methods employed by Americans. If American labor is paid more, the greater pay is more than compensated for by its greater earning capacity.

Just how there could be any real revision of the tariff in the interest of the general public and at the same time preserve the prohibitory schedules, as was done in the Payne bill, and guarantee by the same statutory law a reasonable profit to manufacturers, is a problem unsolved and apparently not capable of solution, for the Republican Party, in full control of the Congress for two years after the promise was made, did not work out that problem. And it is not to be forgotten that the special session of Congress was held and that the revision accomplished was a substantial revision upward and not downward. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

It is not too much to say that the Republican Party stands now and will continue to stand for a high tariff, for a tariff so high as to altogether prohibit importations in many cases, and thereby in such cases to restrict and fence in the American market as the special field for the operation of trusts and other trade conspiracies, which Republican legislation has caused and enabled to grievously afflict the great body of the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The Republican Party has always been the champion and the servile tool of the protected interests. [Applause on the Democratic side.] In speaking of protective tariff, Alexander Hamilton in his celebrated report to Congress in 1790, and Albert Gallatin, the author of the Philadelphia Memorial of 1831, referred to it as restriction, trade restriction. And such is Republican protection—not protection but restriction—not wise and just taxation, but burdensome and unjustifiable trade restriction, the fruit of which is favored combinations and interests exploiting our home markets for their benefit and at an increased expense to the people. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I may be permitted to say that a law which enables one citizen to exact tribute from another citizen under the guise of taxation is governmental authorization for the practice of a wrong. The trouble with the Republicans is that they do not write tariff laws primarily for the purpose of raising public revenue. They frame such laws for the paramount object of restricting the American market and to lay unnecessary burdens upon the American people, and in order to give, and for the real purpose of giving, unnatural and unearned increment to the business of favored manufacturers and corporations. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

It may be that from the laying in some instances of an import duty for revenue there may be some advantage to the domestic manufacturer when his goods come into competition with those of the foreign manufacturer in our markets. But this is incidental and inseparable from the tariff laid in such cases for revenue. A Democratic tariff bill, covering the whole subject, ought to be defined as a measure to impose and collect duties for the purpose of raising the necessary money for the support of the Government honestly and economically administered; and such a measure would fix every duty at the lowest rate consistent with the public necessity. Such a measure would distribute equally, as nearly as practicable, the burdens of taxation, and would reduce to a minimum the incidental protection which can not be avoided under a purely revenue tariff.

The difference between the two parties is that the Democrats assert that the Government ought to levy duties primarily for the sole purpose of raising public revenue, and that this is the only rightful use of the power of taxation [applause on the Democratic side], whereas the Republicans say protection shall be the real object—protection from competition with foreign-made goods, protection to those combinations and interests which have been fostered under a high tariff and allowed to exploit the American people by increased prices at home—a system that has enabled protected manufacturers to charge the American consumer more for their goods than they charge the foreigner for the same goods in a foreign land. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The raising of public revenue is merely the incident of a Republican tariff law—an incident necessary to furnish colorable constitutional authority for upholding Republican abuses of the taxing power. And in this connection it is well to recall the fact that Mr. Dingley, in explanation of schedules of the Dingley tariff law, frankly avowed that the rates fixed in some of its schedules were designedly made so high as to prohibit importations and were not intended to raise revenue. And let us be mindful of the fact that every champion of a protective tariff gives as the chief reason for the beauty of the protective system the benefits which accrue to the interests cared for in the Republican tariff bills.

Subtle and persuasive arguments and appeals are made to these beneficiaries, and in response to such arguments and appeals organized greed has furnished influence and campaign contributions to the Republican Party in the elections. And that party has been kept in control and has long since ceased to regard the rightful use of the taxing power, and has been unmindful of the taxpayers and the consumers. And that is what is the matter with the Republican Party. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

In contrast, the Democratic Party asserts that a tariff law is justifiable because it is necessary to raise revenue to defray the expenses of the Government. In dealing with present conditions, however, grown up under a vicious and exaggerated system, it must be admitted that wholesale or radical changes would be an unwise rule, but the free list can be added to and many substantial reductions in the rates fixed by schedules can be had without doing violence to the business world or to the Public Treasury. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Perhaps it is well to state that the report made by Alexander Hamilton in 1790, the speech of Mr. Clay in the House March 30 and 31, 1824, and the speech made by Mr. Webster in the House on April 1 and 2, 1824, furnish the argument of every Republican utterance made in defense of Republican protective tariffs.

And those who hold as I do, that the Federal Government is not paternal and not authorized to bestow favors upon individuals or corporations through the medium of impost duties or other taxes do not believe that the sound economic principles of tariff taxation advanced by Robert J. Walker in his report of December 3, 1845, have ever been refuted. They are familiar to the Members of this House, but let me state some of them:

That no more money should be collected than is necessary for the wants of the Government economically administered.

That no duty be imposed on any article above the lowest rate which will yield the largest amount of revenue.

That below such rate discrimination may be made, descending in the scale of duties; or, for imperative reasons, the article may be placed in the list of those free from duty.

That the maximum revenue duty should be imposed on luxuries.

That all minimum and all specific duties should be abolished and ad valorem duties substituted in their place, care being taken to guard against fraudulent invoices and undervaluations and to assess the duty upon the actual market value.

That the duty should be so imposed as to operate as equally as possible throughout the Union, discriminating neither for nor against any class or section.

RECENT EVENTS.

Mr. Chairman, it is pertinent in discussing the tariff to consider some recent events and to take our bearings in order that we here may be better guided in our conduct, and I believe it will serve the purpose of putting more courage into the hearts of the Democratic Party. I believe that the trend of events, as is evidenced by the recent occurrences, foretell further Democratic triumphs in the near future. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, these events have accentuated the difference between the Republican and the Democratic theories of taxation, and have tended to make more manifest the righteousness of the Democratic position. Let us not forget that in the beginning, before highly protective and prohibitive tariffs were enacted, there was not a millionaire within the confines of the Republic. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Now there are probably more than a dozen multimillionaires, whose aggregated wealth runs into the billions. To call the roll of the mere millionaires of our country would weary the patience of the House, for they are too numerous and common. Republicans have admitted in their platforms and elsewhere the burdensome injustice of our tariff laws, and have time and again promised correction, and have just as often broken those promises. Corrupt and corrupting contributions have been made by the great insurance companies and other corporations to the election of Republican candidates for office. Extravagance and wastefulness in public administration was admitted by Senator Aldrich, when he declared that the Federal Government could be properly conducted for $300,000,000 per annum less than what is now expended. The stocks of transportation companies have been frequently watered, and yet the Republican Party has repeatedly refused to pass laws for the physical valuation of the property of those corporations, in order to prevent a just determination of a reasonable income to them from the property fairly valued.

In this connection, let me call your attention to Senate Report No. 912, Sixty-first Congress, second session, part 1, page 125, presented by Senator LODGE, a distinguished Republican statesman, on June 23, 1910. There it is stated that overcapitalization of transportation and industrial companies has the effect of advancing prices. The effect of overcapitalization may not be to immediately increase the amount of dividends paid, but an increase of capital usually results in a greater amount of dividends. Increased dividends must mean increased earnings, and the increased earnings come from the consumer. The increased and high cost of living is universally admitted. The easy access of the manipulators of high finance to Republicans in place and power and the baleful influence of those manipulators have been made manifest in our statutory laws. These and other causes have, let us hope, aroused the people so that the Republican Party, arrogant and reckless on account of too long lease and abuse of power, will soon be driven from the control of the Republic. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The tariff ought to be so reformed as not to afford shelter to its evil progeny, the trusts and unlawful combinations, and so reformed as to afford needed governmental revenues only. If the Standard Oil Trust is cited, as it has been in the past, as a case in refutation of Mr. Havemeyer's famous statement that the "tariff is the mother of trusts," let us recall the exposure of the "joker" in the Republican tariff laws which furnished protection to the extent of prohibition of competition to that combination. Upon examination it was found that while petroleum, or oil, was put on the free list there was a proviso in the tariff bill to the effect that such products coming from any country that levied a tax on the same products should be taxed in like amount when brought into this country; and it was then further ascertained that the only oil that could be imported into this country in competition with the product of the Standard Oil Trust was amenable to the taxation under this proviso at a prohibitive rate.

Public sentiment forced the Republican Party to adopt, in part, the Democratic demand for publicity of campaign contributions to the extent that the publication after elections of these contributions is now a requirement of the law approved by a Republican President. Within the last 30 days a Democratic House has gone further in the Democratic demand and passed here a measure requiring the publication before elections of contributions to campaign funds. This same measure has been brought before this same House when it was Republican, by Democrats, and Republicans have refused to give it their sanction. It is to be hoped that a Republican Senate and a Republican President will now further yield to the sentiment of the country against corrupt practices, so that this measure will become a law.

Another encouraging fact is the submission to the States for ratification of the proposed amendment to the Constitution empowering Congress to levy a tax on incomes.

For more than 100 years the power of Congress to levy a tax upon incomes was vindicated by the decisions of the courts; and it may not be too much to hope that this power will be restored to Congress by the ratification of the proposed sixteenth amendment of the Constitution. Should this be done and an income tax levied, so that millionaires and monopolists, domestic and expatriated as well, shall be compelled to contribute to the expenses of the Government, then the time will perhaps come which he avowed had not come, but which was anticipated by Mr. McKinley, when, on May 7, 1890, he said:

We have not been compelled to abolish the internal-revenue system that we might preserve the protective system, which we are pledged to do in the event the abolition of one was essential to the preservation of the other.

That is the Republican doctrine of intoxicating beverages free of taxation, and carries with it the Republican corollary that the clothing and other necessaries of life of the men, women, and children of the land shall forever be taxed, not for the purpose of raising public revenue, but for the purpose of adding to the profits of those engaged in the manufacturing industry. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

THE MORALS OF THE REPUBLICAN PARTY.

Briefly let me refer to the morals of the Republican Party. In the beginning, when it was formed, in 1856, it pretended to be the party of God and morality. It made no utterances then on such sordid questions as the tariff. It spoke of and dealt with things that it claimed to be higher than mere taxation. Now it worships chiefly at the shrine of special interests and bows down before the money power, forgets the people, and resolutely praises the system of protection, which exacts tribute from the poor men, women, and children of our land. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

"Thou shalt not steal," "Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor," was the morality of our fathers. Republican ethics admit, in the framing of the tariff laws, that it is proper for one man to take money from another man, provided it is done in the shadow of a protective-tariff wall. Jugglery of figures, enlarged and confusing tariff terminology, ad valorem duties, specific duties, compound duties, compensatory duties, joined together with mystifying percentages, drawbacks, bounties, lengthy and misleading testimony, specious arguments, and adroit appeals to selfish interests are resorted to by the Republicans in presenting their case "against thy neighbor"—the masses of the people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I will not say that they have been guilty of bearing false testimony against their neighbors, but I do say that Republican speeches and arguments and their statements in the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee justify the assertion that Republicans have exhausted all the ingenuity or inventive skill of the ablest falsifiers that were ever created. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.]

PROTECTIONISM A GROWTH.

Protectionism is not a sudden creation, but an insidious growth; and many of our fellow citizens never comprehended its vice until the growth became malignant. In the sixties high tariffs were enacted upon the ground that they were necessary war measures, and repeal of them was promised when the necessity for their enactment should pass. But under those high tariffs, and under the McKinley higher tariff, and under the Dingley still higher tariff, and under the Payne tariff yet higher, special interests found shelter and multiplied. At every stage additional burdens were imposed upon the people. But in the year 1910 the majority of the American people realized that the constitutional power of taxation for the support of the Government was being exploited for the benefit of the comparative few who had dictated the tariff laws and to the injury of the people. [Applause on the Democratic side.] While in the beginning comparatively few interests found shelter behind the tariff law, it has become indisputable that in every succeeding Republican tariff enactment these beneficiaries of the law have systematically and cunningly reached out and gathered into their fold other interests, to be artificially stimulated at the expense of the taxpayers and for the purpose of increasing the strength of the combination and making it more difficult to dislodge from control the system of protection. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Long ago the Republican Party was forced to abandon the defense of infant industries, for American labor, genius, skill, and enterprise had brought American industrialism to such a vigorous estate that American products could successfully compete, not only at home but in every land, with the industrial fruits of the world.

LABOR AND THE TARIFF.

The argument advanced that Republican tariffs are framed for the benefit of American labor is founded not in fact but in mere pretense. Comparison of the wages paid in high-tariff Germany and those paid in free-trade England will shed light on the subject. Let me give two or three illustrations. In 1905 combers employed in woolen factories were paid upon an average in Germany $4.38 per week, while in 1906 the same character of employees were paid in the United Kingdom (Great Britain) $4.87–$5.60 per week. In cotton manufacturing in Germany in 1905 there was paid to male weavers $4.01–$4.74 per week, while the same employees were paid in England and Wales $5.35–$7.06 per week.

The truth is, Mr. Chairman, and the laboring man now understands it, that the protected manufacturer has not been making a fair division of profits with him. Moreover, the American laborer, considering his skill and efficiency and the fruits of his industry, has not been fairly treated. This is the case: The protected manufacturers have, under the abuses authorized by tariff laws, exacted from the laboring man exorbitant prices for what he consumes—prices greater than those charged the foreigner in foreign markets. The laboring man has been burdened with the increased cost of living, and, furthermore, under the policy of the Republican Party, the cheap labor of foreign countries has been imported by protected manufacturers to compete with the American laborer. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Thus the laborer is burdened, under the policy of the Republican Party, with the higher cost of living on one shoulder and the competition of the imported cheap foreign labor on the other shoulder. This reminds me of Jacob's blessing to his sons, told about in the forty-ninth chapter of Genesis.

I want to read it from the Bible, not so much for the edification of our Democratic brethren, but in order that Republicans on that side may not dispute my authority. The Republicans are so in the habit of contradicting anything that does not harmonize with the Republican theory of robbing the people that I want to quote from the Book of Books. If our worthy Speaker, Mr. CLARK, were present to verify the quotation it would not be necessary to produce my authority. He is, I believe, one of the best Biblical scholars in the House. [Applause.] But he is away. I am going to verify what I say by reading from the Bible itself. You old sinners who never go to church and do not know anything about the Bible, bear with me a moment while I read from the Book. [Applause.] I will read from that chapter where Jacob calls together his sons to receive his blessing and blesses Reuben, Simeon, Levi, Judah, and so forth. In the fourteenth and fifteenth verses he pronounces some sort of a blessing on Issachar, his fifth son by Leah. He had many more sons. I do not know how many sons Jacob had altogether [laughter], but he had many. Issachar was the fifth son born to him by his wife Leah, and the Republican Party has blessed the laboring man just as Jacob blessed this son. [Laughter.] Now, then, listen.

I read the fourteenth and fifteenth verses. Jacob said:

Issachar is a strong ass couching down between two burdens: And he saw that rest was good, and the land that it was pleasant; and bowed his shoulder to bear, and became a servant unto tribute.

I might interpolate the words "Republican tribute." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Under the blessings of the Republican Party the laboring man has indeed been treated as a strong ass couching down between the Republican burden of increased cost of living and the Republican burden of competition with cheap imported labor. And the Republican Party has said that the rest is good and the land is pleasant, and has made the laboring man bow his shoulder to bear and become a servant under tribute imposed by Republican laws. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. ELLERBE. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. CLAYTON. Certainly.

Mr. ELLERBE. Does not the gentleman think it is time for us to sing for the benefit of our Republican brethren the old familiar hymn—

Come, ye sinners, poor and needy,
Weak and wounded, sick and sore.

[Laughter.]

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes; especially for the benefit of insurgents and near-Democrats, who are sick of Republicanism and yet a little too timid to avow themselves Democrats. [Applause.]

It is now manifest that the Republican Party does not by the laws it has enacted favor or protect the American laborer. Perhaps the use of sophistry by the Republicans is nowhere more evident than in their argument of "protection for American labor."

It is interesting to note that in their platform of 1868 is the following expression on the question of the tariff and its relation to the laborer: "It is due to the labor of the Nation that taxation should be equalized and reduced * * *."

When the infant-industry appeal had lost its force, and labor began to protest against the tribute exacted of it in favor of its employers, it was necessary to discover the protection-for-American-labor argument, now proclaimed so loudly by the party of greed. But it is impossible to comprehend that a high tariff in 1868 could be to his detriment by the avowed expression of the Republican Party and yet in 1876 and 1908 be beneficial to him. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The theory of taxation as to its effect upon the masses, of whom the laborers constitute a very large proportion, could not so change in 10 or 20 or 50 years as to render beneficial what was detrimental. Principles do not change.

The measure, Mr. Chairman, in which Republican protection, so called, is claimed to be levied, is the difference between the cost of production here and abroad, and this argument is so manipulated as to attempt to deceive the laborer into the belief that the difference is the discrepancy between the foreign and American wage schedules. To adhere to such a belief would be to profess that the American laborer is not the superior of the foreign laborer.

The per diem wage is ordinarily used in making comparisons between domestic and foreign labor. Now, it is an admitted fact that the intelligence, skill, and industry of the American laborer excels that of the foreign laborer in greater proportion than the relative wages paid. Then no patriotic American will deny that the American laborer engaged in a certain pursuit will produce in a day three to four times as much as the foreign laborer plying the same trade. The following figures, taken from the Engineering Magazine for May, 1904, based on official data and prepared by Prof. William G. Clark, who is indorsed by Senator GALLINGER as an authority, will serve to illustrate the comparative productive capacity of the American laborer and the foreign laborer. The amounts represent the value of the average annual output per laborer of the respective nationalities:

American	$2,450
Canadian	1,455
Australian	900
French	640
English	556

Is it fair, in view of this, to say that the American laborer is better paid than the foreign laborer? If he can produce in one day as much as his foreign brother can produce in three days, he is entitled to more pay. Is it fair to say that he receives more than his due, that you are giving him a bonus? Who pays the bonus, anyway? His brother laborer, who also reaps the profits of this beneficent system of "protection" designed especially for his benefit, and then the latter in his turn must give back to other protected industries, whose products he must have, the excess which he has derived from this system so that the former laborer may profit thereby.

This so-called difference is simply a will-o'-the-wisp, shifting back and forth from one laborer in a protected industry to another laborer in another protected industry. And in the meantime, admitting for the sake of argument the soundness of this contention, what becomes of a laborer not employed in a protected industry? He must pay his tribute to the protected manufacturer for the alleged benefit of his brother laborers, and receive nothing in return from them. As much as 75 per cent of the employee class of the United States are not engaged in industries that have the benefit of Republican protection laws. [Applause on the Democratic side.] What protection do the thousands of railroad employees and the millions of other laboring people not engaged in the manufacturing industries derive from the tariff protection enjoyed by the manufacturers? What benefit to the millions of farmers, tillers of the soil, who plant and sow, gather and reap the great crops of our country, get from the high tariff laws enacted in the interest of the trusts and monopolies which own or control the manufacturing industries?

Again, of what force is the reference to the modern increase in wages when coupled with the increased prices of the necessaries of life? Along with an increase of wages of 22 per cent in the last 10 years there has been an increase in the cost of necessaries of 60 per cent. Thus the laborer is 38 per cent worse off than he would have been had there been no increases. The Payne bill has not given any relief in the matter of the present high cost of living. The Democratic bill now under consideration, if the Republican Senate and the President will let it become a law, will give a large measure of relief.

Let me refer to the latest figures prepared by the Bureau of Statistics, those of 1905, and you can make your own comparisons. It is to be regretted that this bureau has been so busy since 1905 with other matters that it has not had time to give us later figures.

In that year the aggregate value of the finished product of all the manufacturers of the country was $14,802,147,087. The aggregate amount of wages paid for labor in such production was $2,611,540,532. You will thus see that the total amount paid to labor was only 17 per cent of the value of the manufactures, and the lowest rate of tariff on any of such manufactured articles was 30 per cent, ranging from that figure upward to 100 per cent. The discrepancy between domestic and foreign labor, if there be any such real discrepancy, was covered, and, more, the entire cost of labor is doubled, tripled, and even more than quadrupled by the tariff taxes.

Two or three examples will serve to show that the argument of "protection for American labor" advanced in support of the high tariffs is not sustained by the facts:

First. Silk manufactured products in 1905 amounted in value to $133,288,072. For labor there was paid out in their production $26,767,943 in wages to employees, or 20 per cent, and the tariff rates amounted to more than 30 per cent more than the entire cost of labor.

Second. Manufactures of iron and steel were valued during the same period at $941,071,093, and in their production but $143,809,576 was paid to the labor employed. The Payne-Aldrich law "protects" these products at more than twice the entire 15 per cent paid to the labor.

Third. Woolen manufactures in 1905 were valued at $380,934,003, and the manufacturers paid out for wages $70,797,524, or 18 per cent. Under the Payne law these products are provided with 40 per cent of "protection," thus showing that the "protection" amounts to more than twice the entire cost of labor.

Fourth. In 1905, 21 per cent of the value of cotton manufactures was spent for labor, and yet under the Payne bill protection of more than 50 per cent is afforded. And no "protection" is given the laborer who produces the raw cotton from which such manufactures are made, although that commodity furnishes the balance of trade in favor of this country.

What I have said illustrates the unfairness of Republican tariff framers to the American laborer. This unfairness on the part of the protected interests themselves for their faithful employees may be shown by the following examples of the percentages for 1905 of the wages paid to such employees in certain highly protected industries: (1) In the production of food products there was paid to the laborers employed in that industry 5.7 per cent of the gross value of such products, while the employers took for themselves a profit on their capital invested of 16.4 per cent; (2) the capital invested in the production of liquors and beverages took for itself 10 per cent and gave to their laborers 8 per cent of the gross value of all products; (3) manufacturers of chemical products took 9.9 per cent on the capital invested and gave to their employees only 8 per cent of the value of the gross products.

Numerous other illustrations might be given of the extreme injustice to the American laborer which is evinced by Republican champions in all of their "protection" measures. The interests urge the imposition of the high-tariff duties so that they may be able, as they claim, to pass on to their laborers the unearned and artificial profit which comes to them thereby.

Now, the laborer's gratitude must assume enormous proportions to-day when he realizes that, to live as well now as he did 10 years ago, when his wage was $1.50 per day, he must have now $2.40 per day, whereas his wage has increased to only $1.83 per day. Under the high protective tariff laws the manufacturer has exacted tribute from the consumers, but he has not divided fairly with his laborer. Neither the law nor his promptings of conscience compel him to so divide.

And if it be conceded that "protection" is right and proper in so far as it equalizes the alleged difference between the cost of American and foreign labor, let me quote a distinguished Senator of Republican faith, who avows his allegiance to the aforementioned test in drafting tariff schedules. Senator CUMMINS thus indicts his party:

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the duties imposed in the bill [the Payne bill] upon which we are about to vote are generally too high. I regret that they so far exceed the test established by the party to which I belong that it will become impossible for me to give them my approval by my vote. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, July 8, 1909.)

MANUFACTURERS USE FOREIGN LABOR.

So far from being protected, labor is the one unprotected class of our citizenship, and labor is unprotected by the express or implied provisions of the very statutory enactments of the Federal Government. Brief reference to our immigration laws will bear out this assertion, and a visit to the various immigrant stations of the United States would serve to reveal the protection which the American laborer gets from the liberal immigration laws of the United States. At Ellis Island will be seen daily hundreds and hundreds of the worst class of immigrants coming into this country to compete with the American laborer and to run down the price of his wage.

The compilation made and published by the Immigration Commission as to the amount of foreign-born labor that is being used by American manufacturers furnishes some very significant facts and shows unjust treatment of the American-born laborer. Without any care for the good of the American laborer, the American manufacturer is preferring foreign labor over him.

Figures collected from the abstract of the Report of the Immigration Commission submitted December 3, 1910, on "Immigrants in manufacturing and mining," pages 45 and 46 show that upon information received for 507,256 wage earners in mines and manufacturing establishments of 22 classifications 17 per cent of such wage earners are born in this country of foreign fathers, 57.9 per cent are foreign born, and only 42.1 per cent are native born. The manufacturing and mining classifications in which they are engaged are as follows:

Agricultural implement and vehicle manufacturing.
Boot and shoe manufacturing.
Cigar and tobacco manufacturing.
Clothing manufacturing.
Coal mining, anthracite.
Coal mining, bituminous.
Collar, cuff, and shirt manufacturing.
Construction work.
Copper mining and smelting.
Cotton goods manufacturing in North Atlantic States.
Furniture manufacturing.
Glass manufacturing.
Glove manufacturing.
Iron and steel manufacturing.
Iron ore mining.
Leather manufacturing.
Oil refining.
Silk goods manufacturing and dyeing.
Slaughtering and meat packing.
Sugar refining.
Woolen and worsted manufacturing.
Diversified industries. (Page 14.)

At pages 70 and 71 of the report above referred to it is shown that concerning the wage earners of the following respective industries canvassed the following results were shown: In carpet manufacturing there were employed 21 per cent of laborers of native birth but of foreign fathers, 58 per cent of foreign birth and only 42 per cent of native-born wage earners. In car building and repairing only 45 per cent of native-born labor is employed, while 54.9 per cent of foreign born labor was employed, and 16 per cent is native born but of foreign fathers.

In cutlery and tool manufacturing only 36.9 per cent of native-born labor is used, while 63.1 per cent of foreign labor was employed and 18.4 per cent of the wage earners were American born but of foreign parentage. In the manufacture of foundry and machine-shop products the American-born wage earners employed constitute 45.5 per cent of the labor, while 54.5 per cent are foreign born and 21.3 per cent are native born of foreign parentage. In manufactures of rope, twine, and hemp 77.8 per cent of foreign-born labor is used, only 22.2 per cent of American-born wage earners, while in addition to the foreign-born labor used 10.3 per cent of labor native born of foreign parents was employed. In the manufacture of sewing machines only 44.1 per cent of native-born labor was utilized, while 55.9 per cent of foreign born and 27.7 per cent of native born of foreign parentage were employed.

And, Mr. Chairman, before I leave this subject of the importation of foreign labor by manufacturers to compete with American labor, permit me to remark that I have observed a suggestion made by British cotton spinners and made by some of their agents in this country, that it would be in the interest of the cotton spinners, who want cheap cotton, to have imported into the United States cheap foreign labor for the production of cheap cotton. The cotton grower gets now no more than a fair price for his cotton—a crop of which more than 60 per cent is produced by the labor of sturdy white men, assisted by the members of their families; these constitute "a bold peasantry, their country's pride." This is merely another scheme of manufacturers engaged in spinning cotton to oppress labor, and to it I am opposed. [Applause.]

THE FREE-LIST BILL.

Mr. Chairman, the pending bill is for the purpose chiefly of lifting a part of the burden of Federal taxation from the American farmer and to give him a chance to buy his implements at prices as low as the prices accorded by our manufacturers to foreigners, and is, I believe, consistent with the idea that sufficient revenue can be raised from impost duties upon articles not mentioned in this bill and from internal-revenue taxes and from the taxes required of corporations, and will not encourage American manufacturers to sell their American-made goods in the American market at prices greater than the prices received by them for their goods sold in foreign markets in competition with foreign-made goods. That American-made goods have been sold in foreign markets to foreigners cheaper than they are sold at home to Americans, let me cite as proof this statement, taken from the Republican campaign book of 1906:

It is possible that some of these markets (foreign ones) have been gained in the first place through a resort to lower prices—that is, a selling of an article at a lower price abroad than at home—a practice resorted to by every other manufacturing nation with whom we must come into competition. If this has been done, it is to the glory and honor of every American manufacturer who has done it that he has increased the sales of his wares abroad, thereby increasing the volume of his output, the employ of labor, and the wages of his men, for be it understood that American workingmen get precisely the same wages for any goods that may be sold abroad at a lower price as they do for those sold in the home market.

The argument contained in the latter part of this statement quoted is not true, for it is known that the Steel Trust in the manufacture of tin since 1892 paid its employees for goods made for export 25 per cent lower wages than for making tin plate for American consumption. The authority for this is the pamphlet entitled "Export Prices to Date," by Byron W. Holt, issued by the Tariff Reform Association in October, 1906.

I insert in the RECORD the testimony given by Mr. Charles M. Schwab, president of the Bethlehem Steel Co., on December 15, 1908, before the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives (tariff hearings, 60th Cong., pp. 1661, 1662):

Mr. CLARK. Do you know of your own knowledge what is the greatest discrepancy there ever was between the home price of steel rails and the foreign price?
Mr. SCHWAB. The greatest discrepancy?
Mr. CLARK. Yes.
Mr. SCHWAB. You mean how high in this country and how low in Europe?
Mr. CLARK. How much lower did American manufactured steel rails sell for abroad as compared with what they sold for at home?
Mr. SCHWAB. I should say probably $10; I am not sure of that, however; that is merely a guess.
Mr. CLARK. It is a habitual process to sell them cheaper abroad, is it not?
Mr. SCHWAB. Yes, sir; and a very wise process.

And, further, on page 1667 of the hearings, Mr. Schwab gave the following testimony:

Mr. COCKRAN. You said that they are selling abroad cheaper than here?
Mr. SCHWAB. Yes, sir.
Mr. COCKRAN. You said that it is a very wise process?
Mr. SCHWAB. Quite.
Mr. COCKRAN. Could you explain the wisdom of it to the victims of it as well as to the beneficiaries of it? From the point of view of the American consumer, where does the wisdom of it come in?
Mr. SCHWAB. I am not thinking of the consumer. I am thinking of the manufacturer. [Laughter.] I presume there is no argument there.
Mr. COCKRAN. There is no argument there. The more you get the merrier.
Mr. SCHWAB. I have said it was a wise provision for the manufacturer. You can not let a steel plant stand idle. The fires in your furnaces and the heat costs go on whether you are making steel or not.
Mr. COCKRAN. You said as a matter of fact that there are different rates charged for your products abroad, and you charge less abroad than you charge at home?
Mr. SCHWAB. We usually charge abroad what we can get.
Mr. COCKRAN. You do that at home, do you not?
Mr. SCHWAB. Yes; of course.
Mr. COCKRAN. You can not, of course, put a pistol to a man's head and take all he has.
Mr. SCHWAB. You can in some instances; yes.

And on pages 1729 and 1730 of the same hearings Judge Elbert H. Gary, chairman of the board of directors of the Steel Trust, gave the following testimony:

Mr. CLARK. Your selling price for the United States is $28 a ton. What is your selling price abroad?
Mr. GARY. For 1907, the last figures made up, the price of export rails was, on the average, about 22 cents per ton higher than the domestic price.
Mr. COCKRAN. How much higher?
Mr. GARY. Twenty-two cents per ton.
Mr. COCKRAN. Higher?
Mr. GARY. Yes.
Mr. UNDERWOOD. Is that at the factory?
Mr. GARY. Yes; at the factory.
Mr. CLARK. What was it in 1906—how did it run?
Mr. GARY. In 1906 it was $24.08.
Mr. CLARK. Higher?
Mr. GARY. No; that would be lower, you see—$24.08 at the mill.
Mr. CLARK. That was $3.92.
Mr. GARY. The average of the domestic was $27.52; therefore that would be $3.44 lower on the export.
Mr. CLARK. In 1905?
Mr. GARY. In 1905 there was a still greater difference. The export price was $20.98, or a difference of——
Mr. COCKRAN. Seven dollars and two cents.
Mr. GARY. No; $20.98 deducted from $27.37.
Mr. COCKRAN. That would be $6.39, would it not?
Mr. GARY. I presume so.
Mr. CLARK. In 1904?
Mr. GARY. I have not gone back that far.
Mr. CLARK. Was there generally more difference or less difference, do you think, back for 10 years?
Mr. GARY. Ten years?
Mr. CLARK. Beginning in 1897; we have got into the habit of beginning there.
Mr. GARY. I should think fully as much as the figures I gave you.
Mr. CLARK. You sell all of your steel products abroad, as a rule, cheaper than you do at home?
Mr. GARY. Sometimes we do. I think maybe I can give you the figures on the average for 1907.
Mr. CLARK. We would be glad to have them.
Mr. GARY. The average mill price per ton received for exported materials was 7½ per cent less than the average price for domestic shipments.
Mr. CLARK. Now, you sell this stuff that you ship abroad at a profit, do you not?
Mr. GARY. We do, yes; our company, some of the companies we own here, at times shipped at less than profit, I think, taking into account depreciation and administration charges, and all that sort of thing. But it is a fact that manufacturers at times export at prices down to or below cost.
Mr. CLARK. Why do they not reduce the price for the domestic consumer so as to use up this surplus?
Mr. GARY. That probably would not be the result.
Mr. CLARK. There would not be any result?
Mr. GARY. I say that probably would not have the result of increasing the domestic sales. As a rule, the consumers supply their demands at the best price they can get.
Mr. CLARK. Certainly.
Mr. GARY. Then reducing the price would not increase the quantity, and, therefore, you would have the same surplus.
Mr. CLARK. There might be somebody around who wanted to use steel, who was prohibited from using it by the higher price.
Mr. GARY. There might be, but I think that would be exceptional.

Mr. James G. Parsons, secretary of the Tariff Reform Committee of New York, makes the following pertinent comment on Judge Gary's testimony:

THE STEEL TRUST'S JUGGLED AND MISLEADING FIGURES.

Judge Gary's statement here that the "average mill price per ton received for exported materials was 7½ per cent less than the average price for domestic shipments" in 1907 is taken from the annual report of the Steel Corporation for 1907. It is a misleading statement, apparently shrewdly prepared to convey the idea, as it seemed to do before the Ways and Means Committee, that the export price was only 7½ per cent lower than the domestic price of the same goods. This, however, is a piece of deception undoubtedly intended to conceal the extent of this difference. The trick, involving a juggle with the words "average" and "mill price," was clearly exposed by Mr. Byron W. Holt, chairman of the tariff reform committee of the Reform Club, in a specially prepared article published in Thomas Gibson's market letter of June 9, 1908, entitled "The Probable Effect of Tariff Revision on Securities." Mr. Holt said:

"The Steel Corporation has greatly increased its exports since the panic, notwithstanding that the prices of steel in foreign markets have declined far more than at home. In one instance this year 100,000 tons of tin-plate bars were exported to Wales at about $12 a ton below the home price. Tin plate, barb and other wire, and wire nails are probably exported now at from $10 to $20 a ton less than the home price.

"The report of the Steel Corporation for 1907 says (p. 29):

"'The average mill price per ton received for all exported materials was only 7½ per cent less than the average price received for all domestic shipments.'

"As the average selling price of these steel products is about $40 a ton, an average difference of 7½ per cent would mean $3 a ton. This word 'average,' however, may be, and probably is, very misleading. It is undoubtedly true that the goods exported in 1907 were, as a whole, much more highly finished than was the bulk of the goods sold at home. They consisted largely of barb and other wire, wire nails, plates, tin plates, etc. The average domestic price of this class of goods is, perhaps, $45 per ton. If they were sold for export at an average of $35 per ton, they were, in reality, sold $10 per ton below the home price, though they might have been sold only $3 per ton below 'the average price received for all domestic shipments,' which were composed largely of steel rails, billets, merchant steel, tubing, structural material, etc. The per ton price of the exported goods might easily have exceeded the per ton price of the domestic goods and still have been $10 per ton below the domestic price for the class of goods exported."

This would make the difference between export and home prices nearly 30 per cent, instead of "only 7½ per cent." It is reasonably certain that the average difference was not less than 15 or 20 per cent, even in 1907, when, as the report admits, foreign prices were nearer to domestic prices than at any time since the Steel Trust was formed.

In 1908 the difference between export and domestic prices of steel was probably much more than 30 per cent. It is known that in January, 1908, in the transaction referred to in the above quotation from Gibson's market letter, the United States Steel Products Export Co. sold for export 100,000 tons of sheet bars at 81 shillings per ton, delivered in Wales. Deducting $3.50 for freight, the Pittsburg price for these exported goods was $16 against $29, the home price. In this instance the domestic price was 80 per cent above the export price.

There has been another juggle with figures in the Steel Trust's annual report, which served to aid in concealing the enormous earnings of the trust until it also was exposed by Mr. Byron W. Holt, then editor of Moody's Magazine, in the issue of that magazine for August, 1906, and in subsequent articles. In Moody's Magazine for April, 1907, in discussing this matter editorially, Mr. Holt said:

"Our readers will remember that we, last August, called attention to the fact that the 'gross sales' and 'costs' were fictitious and that they were undoubtedly juggled to conceal the actual rate of profit. We challenged the accuracy of these two items and gave most convincing reasons for thinking that 'gross sales' and 'costs' included sales and charges between the subsidiary companies, although there was nothing in the report to indicate this fact. We expressed the opinion that these items were padded to disguise the tariff profits of this most highly protected trust.

"The present report confesses that the 'gross sales and earnings' represents 'the aggregate gross value of the commercial transactions conducted by the respective companies and receipts of the transportation companies for services rendered both to subsidiary companies and to the public.'"

"This statement shows that our reasoning and conclusions were sound, although some of our subscribers who were stockholders were unwilling to believe that their corporation would practice deception and mislead them in this way. It is undoubtedly because of our criticism that this report admits this most peculiar and damaging fact. View it in as favorable light as we can, these figures are made to conceal facts not only from stockholders, but from the public at large, which is taxing itself nearly $100,000,000 a year for the benefit of this giant "infant" and tariff beneficiary.

"It is ridiculous that the financial statement of the Steel Corporation, a holding company and a distinct entity, should give us the gross results of all the transactions which its subsidiary companies have with each other and should not distinguish between such fictitious bookkeeping and meaningless transactions and their transactions with the outside world. And yet the report says:

"'As in previous years' reports, the statement of account, statistics, etc., presented in this report comprehend the combined results for the United States Steel Corporation and all the subsidiary companies * * * liabilities from one company to another are omitted from both liabilities and assets.'

"Of course liabilities from one company to another had to be canceled, but why were other transactions between the companies not also canceled? They are like transfers of dollars or marbles from one pocket to another.

"A street fakir may sell a penknife to Mr. E. Z. Mark for $1 that he ordinarily sells for 50 cents and that costs him only 30 cents. He then, if he is familiar with reports of the Steel Corporation, may ease his conscience by transferring the dollar from one pocket to another until he has run up gross sales to $7. His profits will then be 70 cents, or at the rate or 10 per cent on gross sales.

"Or he may transfer the knife from pocket to pocket before it is sold, charging 10 cents (in his mind) for each shift, until the 'cost' of the knife has increased from 30 to 90 cents. His conscience will then permit him to sell the knife for $1. Great head, good bookkeeping! But the ordinary fakir is too practical to waste his time and wear out his pockets in this way. However, if he had a license that gave him a monopoly of the sale of penknives in a city, and if he had to make reports of sales and profits, he might see a new light and think more favorably of the methods of the Steel Corporation for concealing profits."

And again, on another occasion, in referring to this same deception in the Steel Trust's annual report for 1907, Mr. Holt said:

"The recently issued report of the Steel Trust tells us that the gross sales and earnings for the year ending December 31, 1907, were $757,014,767 and that the net earnings, after deducting $35,000,000 for maintenance and repairs, were $160,964,673. Apparently, then, this trust sold its products at a profit of only 27 per cent on their cost price. This rate of profit does not look large to us when we consider how heavily we tax ourselves to support this prince of paupers.

"But in reality the rate of profit was about twice 27 per cent. In another part of the report we are informed that 'gross sales and earnings' include 'sales made between the subsidiary companies' as well as those to the outside world. This is ridiculous, of course, and is done for the purpose of disguising tariff profits.

"Just what were the 'gross sales' to the public the report nowhere tells us. It does, however, tell us that the total tons of 'rolled and other finished products for sale' were 10,376,742. We know the quoted prices for nearly all of these products, and we know that the average price was not, as the figures indicate, over $70 per ton. We know that it was not $60 or even $50 per ton. It probably did not exceed $40 a ton, or about $414,000,000. Adding $46,000,000—a liberal estimate—for all other possible sales and earnings—from its railroads, sales of cement, spelter, etc.—we have $460,000,000 as the total amount of the gross sales to the public.

"Deducting the net profits, we have less than $300,000,000 as the total cost of the products sold. The actual rate of profit, then, we are proud to say, was 54 per cent on the cost price of the products sold."

GARY'S FIGURES NOT RELIABLE.

These tricks of misrepresentation, characteristic of the Steel Trust's reports, must be kept in mind in considering Judge Gary's statements before the Ways and Means Committee. What he said on that occasion, however, constitutes a conclusive and authoritative admission that practically all steel products are regularly sold abroad at substantially lower prices than at home; that this practice has been going on for years and still continues; that practically all these export sales at lower prices were made at a profit to the manufacturers and from domestic materials, without any reference to drawbacks, and that the manufacturers are regularly "holding up" the domestic consumers for "the best price they can get." Of course, practically all manufacturers do, now and then, both in domestic and export trade, sell certain lots of certain articles at cost, or even less than cost, for special reasons; but Judge Gary makes it clear that any such sales of steel products for export are exceptional. He also shows that the figures quoted in the Republican Campaign Textbook for 1908 (from his statement before the House Committee on Merchant Marine in 1906) can not be depended on for accuracy. The campaign textbook figures, which did service in the presidential campaign of 1908, stated that in 1906 the price of steel rails in the United States for export was "about $26.60" per ton. In December, 1908, after the election, Judge Gary tells us under oath that it was $24.08 in 1906 and much lower in 1905. (Taken from a pamphlet prepared by Mr. Parsons, entitled "Protection's Favors to Foreigners," and printed as S. Doc. 54, 61st Cong., 1st sess.)

Mr. Chairman, the pending bill, let me say, provides that the following articles and necessary utensils employed by farmers in the greatest and most useful of all business pursuits, agriculture, shall be exempt from tariff taxation:

Plows, tooth and disk harrows, headers, harvesters, reapers, agricultural drills and planters, mowers, horserakes, cultivators, thrashing machines and cotton gins, farm wagons and farm carts, and all other agricultural implements of any kind and description, whether specifically mentioned herein or not, whether in whole or in parts, including repair parts.

Bagging for cotton, gunny cloth and all similar fabrics, materials, or coverings suitable for covering and baling cotton, composed in whole or in part of jute, jute butts, hemp, flax, seg, Russian seg, New Zealand tow, Norwegian tow, aloe, mill waste, cotton tares, or any other materials or fibers suitable for covering cotton; and burlaps and bags or sacks composed wholly or in part of jute or burlaps or other material suitable for bagging or sacking agricultural products.

Hoop or band iron, or hoop or band steel, cut to lengths, punched or not punched, or wholly or partly manufactured into hoops or ties, coated or not coated with paint or any other preparation, with or without buckles or fastenings, for baling cotton or any other commodity; and wire for baling hay, straw, and other agricultural products.

Grain, buff, split, rough, and sole leather, band, bend, or belting leather, boots and shoes made wholly or in chief value of leather made from cattle hides and cattle skins of whatever weight, of cattle of the bovine species, including calfskins; and harness, saddles, and saddlery, in sets or in parts, finished or unfinished, composed wholly or in chief value of leather; and leather cut into shoe uppers or vamps or other forms suitable for conversion into manufactured articles.

Barbed fence wire, wire rods, wire strands or wire rope, wire woven or manufactured for wire fencing, and other kinds of wire suitable for fencing, including wire staples.

It is an established fact that plows and the other implements mentioned, boots and shoes, fencing wire, sewing machines, and the other articles named in the bill, are made or produced in the United States and sold in foreign markets for a lower price than at home. There is no justice in that sort of protection which enables the manufacturer to exact of Americans a greater price for plows and other things than he charges the foreigner in foreign lands.

COTTON BAGGING AND TIES.

Mr. Chairman, I must confine myself at the present time to the articles of bagging and ties used in the baling of cotton. I am glad to note that these two articles, the duty on which has cost the southern cotton farmer a million or more dollars annually, are by this beneficent measure placed upon the free list. And I sincerely hope that a Republican Senate will allow them to remain in the bill and pass the measure, and that the President will approve it. Our farmers are entitled to this consideration and to all the relief provided in the bill.

This matter of removing the duty from bagging and ties has been several times heretofore advocated by me. I beg leave to call attention to the following remarks made by me on April 7, 1909, during the consideration of the Payne bill, on that subject:

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Chairman, we are operating to-day in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and considering the tariff bill under a rule that I think not short of infamous, that denies the rights of Representatives here to offer amendments to this tariff bill, which amendments are in the interest of the people. Under this harsh rule it is probable that I will not be allowed at any time to offer amendments to put bagging and ties, in which the great cotton product of our country is baled for the market, on the free list. If I shall have the opportunity to offer these amendments, I shall offer one putting bagging on the free list, in the following words:

"Strike out all of section 350, covering bagging for cotton, gunny cloth, and similar fabrics suitable for covering cotton, composed of single yarns made of jute, jute butts, or hemp, and transfer the same to the free list."

Then I shall offer another amendment putting cotton ties for the baling of cotton on the free list, which is in the following language:

"Strike out section 123, covering hoop or band iron, or hoop and band steel, cut to lengths, or wholly or partly manufactured into hoops or ties, coated or not coated with paint or any other preparation, with or without buckles or fastenings, for baling cotton, and transfer the same to the free list."

Mr. Chairman, I elaborated what I had to say on this subject last Friday in the discussion of the pending tariff bill. I desire now to make a brief statement.

Under the Wilson tariff there were nine mills in this country making bagging for cotton. Under the Dingley bill the Bagging Trust reduced the number to three, and this trust now has a monopoly of the cotton-bagging business. The cotton farmer is compelled to pay a duty on 6¼ yards of bagging per bale or a duty which is a tax of 4¾ cents on the bagging in each bale. Now, I ask that bagging be put upon the free list, because it is not an American product—the jute is raised in foreign lands—because it will benefit the great cotton industry of our country, and because it will tend to destroy the Bagging Trust.

There are about 100,000,000 yards of bagging consumed by the cotton growers in this country per annum. In 1897, 20,000,000 yards were imported before the Dingley law went into effect, paying a duty of $118,000, having a foreign unit value of 6¼ cents a square yard. The three companies having a monopoly of this bagging business are located in New York, Boston, and Indiana.

The cotton farmer, I repeat, pays a duty on 6¼ yards of bagging per bale, or 4¾ cents duty, and on cotton ties, which were free under the Wilson bill, the duty under the present bill is three-tenths of a cent per pound, instead of five-tenths of a cent per pound under the Dingley bill. There were imported into this country, in 1907, 716,819 pounds of cotton ties, paying a duty of $3,584; 16,216,000 pounds came in in the last year of the Wilson bill. The Dingley bill favored the Steel Trust, and the pending bill still hands out favors to this and other monopolies.

No opportunity to offer the amendments mentioned was given me, but when the distinguished gentleman now our Speaker, then the minority leader in this House, was preparing his resolution to recommit the Payne bill with instructions, he included therein at my request the following paragraphs which were prepared by me:

Fifth. Amend as follows: Strike out all of section 350, covering bagging for cotton, gunny cloth, and similar fabrics suitable for covering cotton, composed of single yarns made of jute, jute butts, or hemp, and transfer the same to the free list.

Sixth. Amend as follows: Strike out section 123, covering hoop or band iron, or hoop or band steel, cut to lengths, or wholly or partly manufactured into hoops or ties, coated or not coated with paint or any other preparation, with or without buckles or fastenings, for baling cotton, and transfer same to the free list.

The resolution to recommit was offered by Mr. CLARK of Missouri on April 9, 1909, the day the Payne bill passed the House of Representatives, and that resolution, including the above paragraphs relating to bagging and ties, was rejected by a Republican House.

Under the Payne law the cotton farmer must pay duty on a bale of cotton as follows:

	Cents.
6½ yards of bagging, per bale	4½
Steel cotton ties, per bale	2½
Total, per bale	7 5/10

Under the Payne law the duty on cotton bagging is six-tenths of a cent per yard. Six and one-half yards of cotton bagging are required for a bale of cotton, so that the duty on the bagging required to cover a bale of cotton is 4¾ cents. On a 13,000,000-bale crop of cotton the duty on the bagging required will amount to $617,500.

Under the Payne law the duty on cotton ties is three-tenths of a cent per pound. Eight and one-half pounds of ties are required for each bale of cotton, so that the duty on the ties for a bale of cotton is 2 1/10 cents. On a 13,000,000-bale crop of cotton the duty on the ties required will amount to $331,500.

It will thus be seen that the total duty imposed upon the baling of a 13,000,000-bale crop of cotton will amount to $949,000.

BINDER TWINE AND GRAIN CROPS—COMPARISON BETWEEN COTTON AND GRAIN CROPS.

Yet no duty is placed upon the binder twine used by the grain farmer in harvesting his crop, and here will be seen the unjust discrimination in favor of the grain farmer and against the southern cotton farmer which is perpetrated by the Payne law.

The following table, taken from a table furnished by Mr. O. P. Austin, Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, to me under date of April 26, 1911, will illustrate the relative importance of the cotton crop, compared with grain crops, both severally and jointly:

Production and exports of domestic cereal crops and cotton during the year 1910.

Articles.	Production, calendar years.		Exports, domestic, fiscal years.
	Quantity.	Value.	Quantity.	Value.
	Bushels.		Bushels.
Wheat	695,443,000	$621,443,000	46,679,876	$47,806,598
Oats	1,126,765,000	384,716,000	1,685,474	794,367
Rye	33,039,000	23,840,000	219,756	168,666
Barley	162,227,000	93,785,000	4,311,566	3,052,527
Buckwheat	17,239,000	11,321,000	158,160	103,138
Total	2,034,713,000	1,135,105,000	53,054,832	51,925,296

Cotton	5,551,790,000	820,320,000	3,206,708,226	450,447,243

By this table it will be seen that of cotton there was produced 5,551,000,000 pounds, with a value of $820,320,000; that there were exported for the fiscal year 3,206,000,000 pounds, having a total value of $450,000,000. [Applause.] While the entire exports for the same period of wheat, oats, rye, barley, and buckwheat aggregated $51,925,000. As I have shown, cotton exports for the same period reached the enormous sum of $450,000,000. So that the chief item of our exports, keeping up the gold supply, furnishing the balance of trade in favor of this country, is the item of cotton produced by the southern farmer. [Applause.]

I shall print in the RECORD as an appendix to my remarks the table furnished to me by Mr. AUSTIN.

And, Mr. Chairman, the same consideration that has been shown to the grain grower of the West, which was a right and proper consideration, in giving him free binding twine for his grain, should be shown to the cotton farmer of the South. We contend that there should be free bagging and ties for the southern cotton farmer. [Applause.] I have here a letter, written by Mr. Rochester, explaining this whole matter of the Bagging Trust and the burdensome operations of the law made for the benefit of that trust.

The letter is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 25, 1911.

Hon. HENRY D. CLAYTON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Pursuant to our conversation regarding cotten bagging, I thought well to call your attention to the following features in connection with the American Manufacturing Co. and the Ludlow Manufacturing Associates, better known as the Bagging Trust.

These concerns, by their pooled arrangement under which the American sells about 82 per cent and the Ludlow about 18 per cent of the cotton bagging used to cover the crop of the country, by dint of the protection afforded them under the present iniquitous tariff law, are enabled not only to maintain their own price by reason of having stifled all other independent competition, but there seems to be, along with the gradually increasing price of the bagging, a corresponding decrease in quality.

The American's mills in Brooklyn being located on the East River, that copious estuary furnishes a very large percentage of the weight which goes to make up the Patent Fire-Proofing Compound, by which they set so much store, and the other ingredients of this famous "fire-proofing compound" are common salt, lime dust, barytes, and other similar cheap makeweights. The planter in buying this American-made bagging is paying about at the rate of 4 to 5 cents per pound for East River water and the other ingredients above mentioned, though he gets no benefit whatever of the water, for after the bale of cotton has stood in the sun for a few days the water has all evaporated, and even though he should sell his bale at gross for net, as claimed by some of our Republican friends—but which is not a fact—he would have no show on earth to get back the water, which evaporates into the air.

In an article in the New York Evening Mail of April 22, a notorious high-tariff trust organ, and which article is copiously illustrated with cuts, it is there claimed that the cotton-bagging industry in this country gives employment to 50,000 American laborers. The fact is that it gives employment to less than 3,000 of the poorest and most ignorant little Hungarian, Polack, and Bohemian children—mostly girls. The article in question I am handing you with this letter so that you may see from their own picture the character of American labor that, in their argument of injured innocence, they are seeking to protect.

The fact is that many of these children have no business, under our child-labor laws, to be working in a mill at all on account of their tender age. Moreover they are not American citizens in the strict sense of the word, as these corporations have their agents to take them at the piers as they land from the immigrant ships and steer them into their jute mills at starvation wages of 60 cents per day up to about $1, according to the age and time of service.

These people can not even speak English and have no voice whatever in their contract, for compensation being thankful to get anything whatever once they have landed in America and being incompetent to demand by reason of their ignorance and incompetency any fair wage.

You will also note the claim that there is $8,000,000 invested in this business. The American Manufacturing Co.'s capital stock is $2,000,000, it having cut down its capital stock by $1,000,000 a few years ago and passed it around to its stockholders with a letter of explanation that they were making money so rapidly that they could not use the extra million dollars. And this, under the Wilson law, when they claimed that they were only able to exist by dint of a cut in wages and personal overtures to their operatives to stick by them until the crisis was over.

The Ludlow Manufacturing Associates, while capitalized at a larger amount, it is fair to assume has not employed in this bagging industry more than $500,000, which, you will see on a basis of the pooled ratio above referred to, would be an ample percentage of capital for Ludlow with 18 per cent, as against the American Manufacturing Co.'s $2,000,000 to handle its 82 per cent of the bagging to cover the cotton crop of the country.

POOLED ARRANGEMENT BETWEEN THE AMERICAN MANUFACTURING CO. AND THE LUDLOW MANUFACTURING ASSOCIATES.

FALSE OR FAKED COMPETITION MAINTAINED TO DECEIVE THE PUBLIC.

These matters are thoroughly covered in my letter to Mr. Roosevelt of November 28, 1908, and recorded in tariff hearings of the Sixtieth Congress at pages 4892 and 4893, and the status of which is to all intents and purposes unchanged at this time.

QUALITY OF BAGGING.

I have requested shipped to me by Mr. Harvey Jordan, of Atlanta, samples of the American Manufacturing Co.'s Dundee and the Calcutta bagging, which will be left with Mr. UNDERWOOD when I go back home, and should be glad for you to contrast the qualities of these baggings, which will more forcibly illustrate the imposition than any word of mouth or pen could.

I was glad to see, that when this question came up before, you had gone so fully into the quality of the bagging, and I know that you will give that phase of the question due consideration now, for, under existing conditions, the American cotton bale enjoys to-day the unique distinction of being the most disreputable package of merchandise shipped from any market on the face of the habitable globe. Not because good bagging could not be made and is not made, but because our tariff arrangements are such that they encourage an unscrupulous trust to force down the throat of the helpless farmer or factor the article which to them pays the greatest profit, irrespective of quality or fitness for the purpose.

FIBERS.

You are doubtless aware that the jute fiber all grows in India and comes into this country free of duty, and is used principally for the manufacture of jute bagging, though, to a smaller extent, for jute twines, carpet yarns, and so forth.

Sisal fiber is taken from a species of the cactus plant which grows in Mexico and also comes to this country free of duty, being used principally for the manufacture of binder twine and, to a smaller extent, for rope.

Manila fiber, so called (Abaca), is a product of a species of the banana plant grown, solely for commercial purposes, in the Philippine Islands, and is not only imported into this country free of duty, but ever since we have been in control of the Philippine Islands, by an act of Congress, the cordage manufacturers here have received a bounty of three-eighths of a cent per pound on every pound of Manila hemp shown to have been manufactured here into cordage or binder twine.

Russia hemp is grown in Russia, Austria, and Belgium, principally, and is imported into this country, in very small quantities, free of duty, for use in the manufacture of tarred and untarred rope or cordage.

American hemp is grown chiefly in Kentucky, California, and, to some extent, in Wisconsin, and is used principally in the manufacture of commercial twines.

You will thus see the discrimination against the southern cotton grower and in favor of the western or northern grain grower, which was so forcibly brought out in your speech on the subject during the debate on the Payne-Aldrich bill.

Yours, very truly,

R. ROCHESTER.

I desire to read the following statement made by Mr. C. Lee McMillan, of New Orleans:

I also send you a photograph showing how first bale (1908) new grown Laurel, Miss., cotton looked upon its arrival by express at the New Orleans Cotton Exchange. This cotton was covered with the inferior domestic made bagging, and although it had never been touched with a cotton hook, you can easily see why the farmers loss in weight is often very great. Give the cotton farmer the chance to cover his cotton with bagging such as our Calcutta sample represents, and you will save the South millions of dollars every year.

Mr. GILLETT in his speech last week (see CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 835) told Congress that "the Ludlow Manufacturing Associates were in no combination with the American Manufacturing Co."

In answer to the above I will say that for about 15 or 20 years past the Ludlow people and the American Manufacturing Co. have invariably opened the bagging market upon the same day each year, and both concerns have asked exactly the same price for same quality and weight of goods to every point they did business.

The same plan exactly is followed by the cotton-tie people, and I may further state that what cotton ties the Ludlow people require they get from Messrs. Warren, Jones & Gratz, who are the selling agents for both the Carnegie Steel Co. and the American Manufacturing Co.

Mr. GILLETT also said, "We would be willing to compete with England even with the present low duty." As a matter of fact, more bagging for covering cotton during the past 20 years has been made in Great Britain than in India. One mill (Cleghorn's) of Dundee during the past five years made more cotton bagging than all Calcutta mills put together made.

There are other Dundee mills, also one in Liverpool, engaged in making this bagging for American cotton, and every one of them employs white labor.

Ask Mr. GILLETT how many of those engaged in making bagging at Ludlow own their own homes? How many speak English, and how many are voters? As a matter of fact, Ludlow has the very lowest class of eastern Europe labor, and as making bagging is the easiest of all work in fabrics, little skill is required, and the poor Hungarian gets very small wages.

The best wages paid by Ludlow doubtless goes to those who are engaged in the five other departments Ludlow so fully covered in its signed statement, which you can see if you will kindly refer to the afternoon session before Ways and Means Committee, Monday, November 30, 1908.

Mr. GILLETT stated that "all of the machinery has to be imported from England, because there is none made in the United States, and they have to pay 45 per cent duty on their machines."

I beg to inform you that the Smith & Furbush Machine Co. of Philadelphia, makes all kinds of machinery for cotton bagging, and further, I am pleased to state that the Americans did buy a lot of secondhand bagging machinery in Dundee, which can be imported free of duty.

All of the American bagging mills use a certain percentage of secondhand bagging in making yarns to go into new bagging, and the cost of the secondhand stuff is very low indeed.

The Bagging Trust did buy and dismantle the bagging mills of Louisville, New Orleans, and Galveston. The only mill in the South engaged in making new bagging is the one at Charleston, S. C., which is owned by the American Manufacturing Co., known as the trust.

Those other mills Mr. GILLETT refers to as being in the Southeast are not makers of new bagging, but said mills are engaged in making over and piecing secondhand bagging they buy from the cotton mills as it comes off cotton, and I may here state that all of those little mills put together make up not more than two or three million yards, while the American Manufacturing Co. makes new bagging and new patches for sample holes, say, forty-five or fifty million yards, and the Ludlow Manufacturing Associates, according to its signed statement (see, if you please, afternoon session of Ways and Means Committee, Monday, Nov. 30, 1908), can make 25,000,000 yards.

You will remember that both the American and Ludlow concerns are by no means dependent upon the bagging industry, as both concerns do more along other lines of manufacture than in bagging.

The Bagging Trust for years has been a buyer of Calcutta baggings, and it is now receiving Calcutta-made bagging at its Brooklyn mill. You might ask Mr. Gratz, of the American Manufacturing Co., why do they send Calcutta bagging to the Brooklyn mill? What is its weight upon arrival there? And what is its weight when it is sold and shipped south to their customers? I am sure the Bagging Trust will not protest against salt being put upon the free list, and if you will kindly examine carefully the sample marked "No. 1," I think you will detect salt contained therein, the weight of which would disappear under the rays of the sun.

Mr. Chairman, an amusing thing has been sent to me from Henderson, N. C., under date of April 24, 1911, in which an appeal is made to save the Bagging Trust. It is a circular letter over the printed signature of the Carolina Bagging Co. This circular says that a large amount of capital is invested in the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, and so forth, in the manufacture of bagging, and that "admitting jute into this country free of duty would ruin and close these factories and throw all their labor out of employment." Why, Mr. Chairman, the author of this lamentation and prediction did not know that jute has been admitted for years into this country free of duty. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Jute and jute butts were put on the free list in a Republican tariff for the benefit of the Bagging Trust. It is now the duty on the bagging that we want taken off for the benefit of the consumer, the farmer. Yet these factories have not been closed.

Let me quote from the free list of the act of August 5, 1909, known as the Payne bill:

FREE LIST.

That on and after the day following the passage of this act, except as otherwise specially provided for in this act, the articles mentioned in the following paragraphs shall, when imported into the United States or into any of its possessions (except the Philippine Islands and the Islands of Guam and Tutuila), be exempt from duty:

* * * * * *

578. Grasses and fibers: Istle or Tampico fiber, jute, jute butts, manila, sisal grass, sunn, and all other textile grasses or fibrous vegetable substances, not dressed or manufactured in any manner, and not specially provided for in this section.

Jute and jute butts were put on the free list away back in the days when the McKinley bill (see H. Rept. 1466, 51st Cong., 1st sess., p. 15) was enacted, and were retained on the free list in the Dingley law and embodied in the free list in the Payne law, as shown above. This suffices to illustrate how ignorant some tariff prophets are or how forgetful of facts they can be in making arguments for the retention of tariff duties which enable a trust—the Bagging Trust, for instance—to rob the farmer.

Mr. Chairman, when I first came to Congress I saw a man hanging around the doors of this House and about the rooms of the Committee on Ways and Means. I was told that he was the agent or lobbyist of the Bagging Trust. At the first session of the next Congress I saw that same man sitting as a Republican Member of Congress in this House. I do not know what has become of him latterly, but whether the Bagging Trust has a representative in this Chamber or not, the fact remains that that trust is furnished protection in the present tariff law, and the merchants and the farmers of the South know that methods similar to those which have been practiced by the Tie Trust are practiced by the Bagging Trust. It will be remembered that in the spring of 1906, after the cotton plant had begun to grow, it seemed apparent that there would be a very large crop on account of a large acreage and weather conditions. There were about 2,500,000 bundles of cotton ties ready for shipment, but the Steel Trust in one day sent out telegrams over the entire cotton belt raising the price of ties 10 cents per bundle, thus taking from the pockets of the cotton growers $250,000 at one time on cotton ties. If the pending bill should become a law we hope and expect to get rid of the burdensome exactions made by that trust and the Bagging Trust under the protection afforded them by the present tariff. [Applause.] Thereby the producer of cotton will be put upon the same footing as the producer of grain, who is furnished with untaxed binder twine.

Now, lest some man will say that the purchaser of the farmer's bale of cotton pays for the bagging and ties, let me refute that. Everybody knows that the great bulk of the cotton crop is exported, and wherever the bulk of any product is exported necessarily the price of that article so exported is fixed according to the foreign demand and the foreign price. So we can correctly contend that the price of cotton is fixed by the Liverpool market. Everybody knows that the price is fixed in that way and that the cotton trade does not reimburse the farmer for the amount he expends in the purchase of bagging and ties. The farmer takes that money directly out of his pocket and pays it to the retail merchant every time he has a cotton bale packed. He is out that amount for bagging and ties. Does he get it back? Not so. The consumer of the cotton—the spinner—deducts the weight of the bagging and ties as tare from the cotton when he pays for the cotton. That tare has ranged from 22 to 30 pounds per bale, according to the estimated weight of the bagging and ties. Therefore it is a total loss to the farmer; he is never reimbursed.

I have here copies of a number of letters sustaining that statement, written by the President of the New Orleans Cotton Exchange and Secretary Hester, of the same exchange, and others, and one just received by me under date of May 2, 1911, from Mr. McMillan, of New Orleans. Let me read Mr. McMillan's letter:

C. LEE MCMILLAN & CO. (LTD.),
New Orleans, May 2, 1911.

Hon. HENRY D. CLAYTON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Please permit me to state that those small bagging mills in the Southeast that are protesting so strongly against the removal of the duty on bagging are not engaged in making new bagging out of new jute, but are engaged in piecing or making over the old bagging after it is taken off cotton at the mills.

The output of such mills as described above is a very poor stuff, indeed, and it is the cause of much of the complaint heard about improper covering for American cotton.

To those who are upholding the claim of the United Steel Co. that the cotton planter reaps a large profit upon the ties he uses you may say that all European or foreign cotton buyers figure the tare for bagging and ties as being 6 per cent. The majority of the American spinners figure this tare at 5 per cent, while none of them calculates tare at less than 4 per cent.

The average bale of cotton has on it—

	Pounds.
7 yards 2-pound bagging, say	14
6 steel bands, weighing 1½ pounds each	9
Making a total of	23

so you will see that the planter gets back nothing whatever for his bagging and ties.

Yours, respectfully, C. LEE MCMILLAN.

And I now read the others:

SAVANNAH, GA., May 26, 1909.

Hon. C. L. BARTLETT,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Offers from Europe name a price which includes cost of freight, marine insurance, and 6 per cent tare on a 500-pound bale. Six per cent would be 40 pounds, which covers 16 pounds for 8 yards of bagging, 8 pounds for 8 ties, and 6 pounds for natural drying of cotton and consequent shrinkage in weight; nominally the farmer is paid for bagging and ties, but the spinner can't spin them. He sells them for junk; consequently the price he offers is a figure arrived at after deducting what his loss will be on the bagging and ties; also is true that farmer in reality is not paid for bagging and ties. American spinners usually get 28 pounds tare, and also deduct from price they pay for cotton the loss they will sustain on the bagging and ties.

W. W. GORDON.

NEW ORLEANS, LA., May 26, 1909.

Hon. A. S. BURLESON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Your contention in dispatch concerning tare on cotton is true. When the farmer buys bagging and ties he pays therefor some 9 cents per bale more than he would pay if free. When the spinner buys from the farmer he deducts from the worth of the cotton the amount of his loss by bagging and ties. Therefore the spinner does not pay the tariff profit that goes to the manufacturers of bagging and ties and the farmer does. But even if spinner did pay, antagonists' argument is not strengthened, because spinner would add excess to manufactured product and thus increase the cost to consumer. In either case the trust collects the profit and the people pay.

W. B. THOMPSON,
President New Orleans Cotton Exchange.

NEW ORLEANS, LA., May 26, 1909.

Hon. A. S. BURLESON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

It is a well-known fact that all buyers on both sides of the Atlantic allow in the prices they pay fully enough, if not more than enough, to offset the weight of bagging and ties on a bale. As a general thing 6 per cent is allowed for tare by foreign spinners. While all spinners practically buy on the basis of tare, care is generally taken that allowances always equal and frequently exceed actual tare.

HENRY G. HESTER.

NEW ORLEANS, LA., May 27, 1909.

A. S. BURLESON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

All cotton sold for export deducts 6 per cent tare for bagging and ties; domestic mills claim 4 to 5 per cent tare.

NORMAN EUSTIS,
Acting Chairman Cotton Factory Association.

NEW ORLEANS, LA., May 27, 1909.

A. S. BURLESON,

Cotton sold for export carries 6 per cent deduction for tare; domestic mills calculate about 5 per cent.

NEW ORLEANS COTTON BUYERS' AND EXPORTERS' ASSN.,
A. J. WEST, President.

Every man familiar with the production, handling, and sale of cotton knows what I have said to be true. It has never been challenged by any man who has witnessed the growth of the cotton plant from the time it shot up its two tender leaves, from the time it blossomed into whiteness, from the time that the pink blossoms came into the beautiful green and graceful foliage. No man who has witnessed its development into the full-grown boll; who has witnessed in the fall, as if touched by magic, the whole field becoming like an expanse of snow in its whiteness and purity—no man who has ever witnessed all these things has ever challenged the statement that under Republican tariff laws the farmer who makes the cotton loses the sum that he pays out for the ties and bagging in which he wraps his cotton, the cotton which is the common raiment of mankind and is at the same time well-nigh all the "purple and fine linen" of the poor, God's poor that our Savior loved so well. It is the learned Republican tariff doctrinaire, the pretentious disseminator of secondhand misinformation, who asserts that the spinner pays for the bagging and ties used in preparing the great cotton crop for the markets of the world. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I thank you for your courtesy and indulgence. [Applause.]

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE AND LABOR, BUREAU OF STATISTICS,
April 26, 1911.

For Hon. HENRY D. CLAYTON,
House of Representatives.

O. P. AUSTIN, Chief of Bureau.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolutions of the following titles:

H. J. Res. 3. Joint resolution making immediately available the appropriations for mileage of Senators and of Members of the House of Representatives; and

H. J. Res. 38. Joint resolution to grant authority to the American Red Cross to erect temporary structures in Potomac Park, Washington, D. C.

THE TARIFF.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I now yield 45 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. KNOWLAND].

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. Chairman, this house has had under discussion during recent years few measures that have occasioned as exhaustive, illuminating, and interesting debate as the Canadian reciprocity and free-list bills. Both of these measures deal with that great subject, the tariff, with which this Nation has been struggling since George Washington affixed his signature in 1789 to the original Federal tariff, the second act of the First Congress of the United States, down to the present moment, when the Sixty-second Congress is discussing the pending free-list bill. No question of governmental policy has been as continuously and widely discussed or as repeatedly advanced as a political issue. While I approach the subject from the standpoint of one who firmly believes that protection is the fixed economic policy of the Nation, it is my purpose in the time allotted to deal with the question of methods rather than the subject of schedules.

OUR TARIFF METHODS OBSOLETE.

During the 122-year period, to which I have just alluded, the progress of the country has been by leaps and bounds. In every governmental department we have striven to keep pace with the enlightened and progressive spirit of the age by adopting improved and modern methods. In the manner of framing tariff laws, however, we still follow practically the same antiquated, obsolete, and primitive methods in vogue for over a century and a quarter.

TARIFF AGITATION INVARIABLY DISTURBS BUSINESS.

The tariff affects practically every line of business in the country. It involves economic and industrial questions of the gravest importance. When a tariff agitation is on, even before the actual framing of a tariff bill commences, business is at a standstill. The mere knowledge that a revision is contemplated upsets all lines of industry. Merchants hesitate to place orders, investors are cautious, and new enterprises are delayed. Having had some little experience with financial institutions, I fully appreciate how little it takes at times to disturb conditions. When finally Congress undertakes to revise the schedules there is an impatient clamor all over the country for an early settlement, and Congress is bound to be somewhat responsive to that demand, and undue haste invariably results. And still we go along in the same old rut, failing to profit by the experience of a century and a quarter.

GROWING SENTIMENT FOR IMPROVED METHODS.

I mistake the temper of the American people if the day is not rapidly approaching when they will insistently demand that more enlightened and scientific methods be adopted in dealing with this great question and a public sentiment, national in scope, will crystallize in favor of a nonpartisan, but permanent, tariff board—a body that will confine itself to the important and necessary preliminary work of gathering and sifting information and performing the technical work so essential in placing before Congress data necessary in dealing with the various schedules, practically all of which are intricate. [Applause.]

LITTLE CHANGE IN METHODS SINCE 1789.

Let us here hastily review our system of tariff making for the last 125 years. The rather meager accounts we have of the debates upon the first tariff act reveal the fact that there existed then the same wide divergence of views and that the demagogue was in evidence even in that day, as illustrated when a duty on candles was proposed of 2 cents per pound, affording opportunity for one of the South Carolina Representatives to wax eloquent over tallow candles, protesting in the name of the people—whose spokesman the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] has lately become—against "a tax on light." History does not record whether the people's champion from South Carolina nursed an ambition, like the gentleman from Kentucky, to occupy a seat in another branch of Congress and grasped at the candles to light his way thither. [Laughter.]

The ancestors of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] were agitated over fish, New England being engaged in a profitable trade with the West Indies, furnishing those tropical islands with low-grade fish and receiving in return rum and molasses, principally rum, and with their usual ability and strenuousness the New Englanders opposed any restriction on imports from these islands. From early April until July our forefathers struggled with the items in this first bill. They were handicapped then, from all accounts, as we are to-day by the scarcity of accurate and technical information.

MANY TARIFF CHANGES—LOGROLLING INTRODUCED.

Between the passage of the acts of 1789 and 1816 fully 21 changes were made in the tariff, demonstrating that our early statesmen were still groping in the dark. When it came to the act of 1816 Congress established a speed record not since equaled in tariff making. It was only 39 days from the date of introduction until the act had received Executive approval. In 1824 we find that Congress was again debating the great question and the whole country was agitated. Business was disturbed and party feeling ran high. Clay and Webster were principals in the memorable debate. The system of log-rolling between different sections and States is not a new condition, apparently, for we find that during the framing of this act New England rum and Kentucky whisky formed a partnership. Evidently sectional lines were eliminated when whisky and rum joined hands. The interest manifested was so keen and the vote so close that sick Members were brought into the House on stretchers to vote.

POLITICS ALWAYS PLAYED IMPORTANT PART.

The act of 1828—the "tariff of abominations," as it was opprobriously termed—was an illustration of tariff tinkering for political purposes. A wit of that day suggested an amendment to the title so that it would read "An act to encourage the manufacture of a President of the United States" instead of "An act for the encouragement of certain manufactures." The suggestion of a similar amendment to the pending free-list bill might cause a blush to mount the cheek of the present and popular Speaker of the House.

It is needless to go into the history of the various acts which followed, including the Clay compromise measure of 1833, when politics played an important part and caused the charge of inconsistency to be made against Clay; the Whig tariff of 1842, when the Chief Executive and Congress clashed, President Tyler vetoing two bills before one reached him that met his approval; the Walker revenue tariff of 1844, which remained in force 11 years, longer than any act with the exception of the Dingley law; the Hunter bill; the Morrill tariff of 1861; the Civil War measures of 1862 and 1864, followed by the acts of 1870, 1872, and 1875. Then came the acts of more recent date, including the McKinley, Wilson, and Dingley laws.

In the framing of each of these many acts conditions were strikingly similar. There was frequently undue haste, log-rolling was common, accurate information was difficult to obtain, business conditions were disturbed while the bills were under discussion, and politics played too important a part in determining rates of duty, as will invariably be the case, to a greater or less degree, until some nonpartisan and impartial body presents to Congress unbiased and unsuppressed facts regarding schedules, brought to light after exhaustive inquiry by a force trained in obtaining statistical and technical information. [Applause.]

RECENT TARIFF BILLS.

In framing the Payne bill, I think, it is generally admitted that more information was placed before Congress and the country by the Ways and Means Committee than by any committee in the history of previous tariff legislation. The committee first met on November 10, 1908. The bill became a law on the 5th day of August, 1909, nearly nine full months of consideration being given to the measure by the committee and Congress. The testimony before the committee covered 10,000 pages, and yet the information—the character of information so essential in the framing of any tariff bill—was of necessity incomplete. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] himself stated on this floor that if the committee had been given more time the information would have been more complete. The Payne bill contained 718 paragraphs, and the index shows upward of 4,000 articles listed.

In the hurried framing of the pending free-list bill, upon which no hearings were had, we are informed in the report of the minority that the statement was first made in the Ways and Means Committee by the sponsors of the bill that it would reduce the revenues only about $1,500,000 annually, but they now acknowledge that it will cut down the annual revenues more than $10,000,000. Is this the character of information upon which we should proceed to revise schedules? [Applause on the Republican side.]

EFFORTS IN CONGRESS TO CREATE PERMANENT TARIFF BOARD.

The sentiment for a tariff board has been given great impetus as the result of recent attempted legislation. Responsive to an enlightened public sentiment, the Republican Party, always progressive, endeavored at the last session of Congress to create a permanent nonpartisan tariff board, but as a result of a Democratic filibuster in both branches of Congress the bill finally failed of passage.

The measure passed the House on January 30 of this year by a vote of 186 to 93, only 2 Republicans being recorded in the negative, while 91 Democrats placed themselves on record in opposition to the policy of dealing with our tariff question in a businesslike manner. The bill passed another body but four hours before final adjournment by a vote of 56 to 23, a Democratic filibuster in that body preventing an earlier vote. Only 3 Democrats voted for the bill and but 2 Republicans against. When the bill, with slight amendments, reached the House a special rule was adopted for its immediate consideration with a view to concurrence in the Senate amendments; but Democratic Members, under the able leadership of one of the best parliamentarians in this House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], by dilatory motions prevented a vote.

PROVISIONS OF TARIFF BOARD BILL CONSIDERED LAST SESSION.

This bill provided for a permanent tariff board of five members, not more than three to be of the same political party. Section 1 of the bill fixed the term of office at six years, the chairman to be designated by the President and to receive a salary of $7,500, the other members $7,000 each.

Section 2 provided that the principal office was to be in the city of Washington, but the board was empowered to sit in any other section of the United States or in foreign countries.

Section 3 set forth the scope of the work of the board. It was to investigate the cost of production of all articles now or hereafter the subject of tariff legislation, with special reference to wages paid domestic and foreign labor and the the prices of raw material, domestic or imported, entering into manufactured articles. The condition of domestic and foreign markets affecting American products was to be a subject of careful inquiry.

Section 4 empowered the board to investigate and furnish the President information as to the effect of tariff rates, restrictions or regulations imposed by any foreign country, and as to export bounty paid or export duty imposed upon the exportation of any article to the United States, and to assist in the application of the maximum and minimum tariffs.

Section 5 provided for the subpœnaing of witnesses and the procuring of books and papers.

Section 6 provided for the protection of confidential information obtained by the board.

Section 7 provided that the board should report the facts obtained to the President and Congress when called for, and the last section, section 8, provided that the new board should succeed the present Tariff Board.

Notwithstanding the regrettable failure of this bill, there now exists, temporarily at least, a Tariff Board created by authority of section 2 of the Payne Tariff Act, containing the maximum and minimum provisions, the concluding sentence of that section reading as follows:

To secure information to assist the President in the discharge of the duties imposed upon him by this section, and the officers of the Government in the administration of the customs laws, the President is hereby authorized to employ such persons as may be required.

This board was appointed in September, 1909, and then consisted of the following named: Henry C. Emery, former professor of political economy at Yale College; James B. Reynolds, former Assistant Secretary of the Treasury in charge of customs, and Alvin H. Sanders, publisher of the Breeder's Gazette. The sundry civil bill approved June 25, 1910, carried an appropriation of $250,000 for the expenses of this board, enlarging its powers as follows:

To enable the President to secure information to assist him in the discharge of the duties imposed upon him by section 2 of the act entitled—and the officers of the Government in administering the customs laws, including such investigations of the cost of production of commodities, covering cost of material, fabrication, and every other element of such cost of production, as are authorized by said act, and including the employment of such persons as may be required for those purposes; and to enable him to do any and all things in connection therewith authorized by law, $250,000.

The board has since been increased to five members, two Democrats being added—William M. Howard, of Georgia, an ex-Member of this body, and Thomas N. Page, formerly a professor of political economy in the University of Virginia. The sundry civil act of this year carried an appropriation of $225,000, the language of the item corresponding with that contained in the previous sundry civil bill, which will enable the board to continue in existence at least until June 30, 1912. Before this date, however, it is earnestly hoped that public sentiment, and an appreciation by Congress of the value of the board's work, will result in further provision being made for its continuance. [Applause.]

Neither under the language of the Tariff Board bill of last session nor that contained in the sundry civil bills would or does Congress surrender any of its legislative prerogatives. In framing tariff acts Congress needs facts presented by an authoritative body composed of men who command the respect not alone of Congress but of the country as well.

WORK OF THE PRESENT TARIFF BOARD.

I would suggest to Members of Congress who entertain a doubt as to the necessity of a Tariff Board, or who are unfamiliar with the scope of the investigations under way, that they visit the offices in the Treasury Building, where they will be afforded every facility to familiarize themselves with the methods adopted and learn of the intelligent, painstaking, and successful efforts of this board to obtain facts.

It should be borne in mind that the first appropriation under the language enlarging the powers of the board was passed the latter part of June of last year, so that the board has really only had about 10 months in which to conduct investigations upon any extended scale. The first work, for which an appropriation of $75,000 was made at the time of the passage of the Payne Act, was the study of foreign tariffs in connection with the maximum and minimum clause.

Experts here and in Europe are preparing reports and making analyses of different items in the tariff schedules. Experienced and competent men are employed in this work. Chemicals, earthenware and pottery, iron and steel, wool and woolens, and many other items are included. There has been undertaken a glossary of the tariff act which has been appropriately designated "a translation of the tariff into English." It permits anyone to read a complicated schedule and understand the technical and commercial facts regarding the articles put in simple language.

In conversation with the expert in charge of the work on Schedule A—the chemical schedule—he explained that for this glossary he was taking every chemical enumerated, the process by which it is manufactured, the States and countries from which the supply comes, the chief markets, figures of production, imports and exports in this and leading competing countries, and a calculation of duties collected in ad valorem terms. I doubt if there has ever been undertaken such a complete and accurate report.

Samples of foreign and domestic woolen goods are being collected with relative prices here and abroad. Costs of making the American fabrics abroad will be investigated. Agents of the board are now at domestic mills looking into the question of costs. Inquiries abroad are under way on shrinkage of foreign wools as a basis for the compensating duty, and one into foreign wages and labor efficiency in the textile industries.

In every section of the United States where wool is grown agents have been gathering information as to costs, quality, and other important facts. This investigation has been extended to Australia, New Zealand, Argentina, and Chile. This is but a mere outline of the work.

TARIFF COMMISSION OF 1882.

A tariff commission was provided by an act of Congress in 1882, and both the advocates and opponents of this method of solving the tariff problem cite our experience in 1882 both in favor of and against the policy of creating a permanent tariff board. I have gone into the history of this commission quite exhaustively.

The Tariff Commission of 1882 was created by an act of Congress approved on May 15 of that year. Under its provisions the President was empowered to appoint nine commissioners from civil life. The act did not provide that the commission should be nonpartisan. It was to investigate all the various questions relative to the agricultural, commercial, mercantile, manufacturing, mining, and industrial interests of the United States, so far as the same "might be necessary to the establishment of a judicious tariff, or a revision of the existing tariff, upon a scale of justice to all interests." The commission was empowered to visit different sections of the country, and to report its investigations not later than the first Monday of December of the same year, which it did, the report, including the testimony, consisting of two large volumes which I now hold in my hand.

The work was necessarily hurried, the commission holding its first meeting in July and reporting in December, a period of five months. No foreign investigation was made, but over 29 different localities were visited, 600 witnesses examined, and 2,625 printed pages of testimony taken.

The commission drew up a provisional scale of duties, which was made the basis of the tariff act of 1883, which remained in force until 1890, a period of over seven years. A comparison of the recommendations of the commission with the act of 1883 shows that Congress adopted a large majority of the rates suggested without change. It made the first scientific classification, which, in the main, has been retained to the present day. Its recommendations as to administrative features were likewise adopted and have become permanent law. It advocated and proposed a bill establishing a customs tribunal for the determination of disputed questions arising under our tariff laws.

This Tariff Commission of 1882, created only as a temporary body, was unquestionably a success, performing excellent service, considering its limited powers for investigation and the short time in which it was compelled to perform its work.

EXPERIENCE OF FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

Foreign countries, riper in experience, have come to realize the futility of longer adhering to archaic methods in dealing with the tariff question. Germany leads with her "Special Commission for the Elaboration of Measures for Furthering Commerce." This commission consists of 30, the following organizations each having 5 members: The German Agricultural Association, the German Association of Chambers of Commerce, and the Central Association of German Manufacturers. The other 15 members were appointed by the chancellor, 6 representing the agrarian interests, 5 the manufacturers, and 4 the wholesale trade. In its entirety it is a most representative body.

This commission met for the first time in November, 1897. The new tariff bill was not ratified until December 25, 1902.

Five years of investigation! Compare this with our present methods.

The Government of Austria called into consultation a committee of the associated chambers of commerce, who rendered most valuable service in solving the tariff problems of that country. Similar enlightened methods are being adopted elsewhere. Shall we profit by their experience?

CALIFORNIA'S POSITION.

In advocating legislation for a permanent tariff board I am not alone voicing my own strong convictions upon the subject, but am likewise expressing the progressive sentiment of the Republican Party of California as affirmed in the last State platform. After declaring its "unswerving adherence to the Republican doctrine of protection without which the American standard of living can not be maintained," and expressing the opinion that the true measure of protection is the difference in the cost of production and distribution at home and abroad, the California Republican tariff plank, after deprecating the methods heretofore prevailing in framing tariff acts, contained the following indorsement for a permanent tariff board:

We therefore join with the President in demanding the appointment of a permanent tariff commission, wholly removed from the possibility of political pressure or improper business influences. Such commission should ascertain the difference between the cost of production, which is mainly the difference of labor cost, and the distribution here and abroad. As fast as its recommendations are made Congress should revise one schedule at a time. We oppose any future general revision based upon insufficient data to determine the amount of protection actually needed.

No State in the Union has enjoyed a larger share of the prosperity resultant from the Government's policy of protection than the Commonwealth of California. This policy has been of almost incalculable benefit to our hop growers, to our sheep raisers, to our wine producers, to the raisin, Zante currant, olive, prune, lemon, orange, dried-fruit, and fig industries. All we ask, or expect, is the imposition and maintenance of such duties as will permit us to successfully compete with foreign countries where the scale of wages is so low that to admit these competing articles free, or at too low a rate of duty, would spell ruin to these industries. We court a fair, intelligent, and thorough study of conditions by an impartial tariff board, and for one I am willing to abide by the result of such an investigation, and the Representatives of any other State, or the champions of any industry, should be likewise willing to submit to facts obtained through a nonpartisan body composed of high-class men interested only in obtaining facts. It will mean the sustaining of just schedules, while those which can not stand the light of day should not survive. [Applause.]

I voted for reciprocity with Canada, and for this vote have been severely criticized—as have likewise my Republican colleagues from California who supported the measure—by certain ultra protectionists, and reprisals have been threatened against protected industries of California. The last California Republican State platform declared—the allegiance of the Republicans of California to the policies enunciated by President Roosevelt and reaffirmed and already in part enacted into law under the administration of President Taft.

We commend President Taft in his efforts and announced intentions further to carry out these policies, and look to our Senators and Representatives in Congress to cooperate with him to that end.

Reciprocity has been one of the policies most strongly urged by Theodore Roosevelt and reaffirmed by President Taft. When I can not stand upon the platform of the Republicans of the State which I in part have the honor to represent, refusing to carry out the expressed wishes of the majority, I shall so announce and immediately resign my seat in this body.

I might remark, however, that, in my opinion, our "stand-pat" friends and certain insurgents from the border States are unduly alarmed over the possible detrimental effects of this proposed trade agreement. We should deal with this question upon the broad grounds of closer relationship with a people who are naturally drawn toward us by ties of tradition and common aspirations. I certainly regard the policy of Canadian reciprocity as progressive and enlightened. [Applause.]

PRESENT DEBATE ILLUSTRATES NECESSITY OF HAVING AVAILABLE RELIABLE FACTS.

The debate upon Canadian reciprocity and the pending free-list bill illustrates the necessity of having available reliable facts. Every item in these bills has been discussed, and those holding opposing views have presented a different array of figures. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] has had his facts challenged by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], while the statements of many gentlemen on both sides of this Chamber are strikingly at variance.

Statistics are quoted from newspapers, from farmers, from manufacturers, and from every conceivable source. I have heard myself twenty different prices of wheat and barley quoted, and in every instance with an assurance of their correctness. We want facts, and if reliable statistics were available much of the present confusion would not exist.

I shall vote against the free-list bill because it has been presented without careful consideration and investigation. It is a political bill pure and simple, hurriedly drawn, with its possible effects not inquired into.

The haphazard manner in which this bill was drawn reminds me of a game many of us have played in our younger years. A good-sized picture of a donkey is placed against a wall, and each participant in the fun is blindfolded and furnished with a representation of the caudal appendage of that animal, to which a pin is fastened, and then an effort is made to attach it at the right place. You grope in the dark, flounder about, stabbing here and there, the donkey in the meantime being punched full of holes. So it is in this instance. Our Democratic friends, in their haste to get this measure before the House, have gone at it blindly, each Member with an item for the free list in his hand, striving to properly decorate the Democratic donkey, but already the poor animal is badly punctured. [Applause.]

REVIEW OF ARGUMENTS IN FAVOR OF TARIFF BOARD.

Let us sum up the arguments in favor of the retention of the present Tariff Board as a permanent body. The history of tariff legislation in this country demonstrates conclusively that improved methods are needed. Our experience with the temporary tariff commission of 1882 is a strong argument in favor of this enlightened and scientific method of tariff adjustment. The success of the German and Austrian tariff commissions multiply the reasons already advanced. Evidence of the intelligent, thorough, and unprejudiced efforts to obtain facts which the present Tariff Board is exhibiting is a final reason why this Congress should rise to the occasion, make the board a permanent body, thus announcing to the world that this Government in the future proposes to solve its tariff problems along scientific lines, enabling justice to be done to all industries, interests, and localities. [Loud applause.]

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HINDS].

Mr. HINDS. Mr. Chairman, at this time, when the relations of the farmer to the consumer are so much in the public mind, a discussion in the Report of the Secretary of Agriculture of the United States for 1910 is of much value. It was made before the present questions as to removal of duties on foreign farm products had arisen, and therefore is not to be impeached by charges of bias on the particular questions at issue. It was made when the prices of farm products were at their highest point, from which they have already made a long recession, and therefore states at its strongest whatever case there may be against the farmer as related to the consumer. It seems to me to dispose effectually of any claim that substantial relief for the consumer is to be expected by proceeding against the farmer, to explode utterly the immature conclusion that the acres of the United States can not feed the people of the United States, and, finally, to show how brief has been the American farmer's respite of prosperity after long years of production at less than cost. The discussion is on pages 19 to 30 of the report and is as follows:

PRICES OF FARM PRODUCTS—FARMER'S SHARE OF CONSUMER'S COST—AN EQUALIZING PROCESS.

High prices was one of the subjects of my annual report for 1909. It was shown that for many years previous to about 1897, or a little later, the prices of farm products received by farmers were even less than the cost of production, and often little, if any, above that cost, so that during a long period of years the farmer was not thriving. It was shown also that in the upward price movement, which began about 1897, the prices received by the farmer have advanced in greater degree than those received by nearly all other classes of producers. That this should have been so was merely a matter of justice to the farmer to equalize the reward of his efforts with the rewards received in other lines of production.

INCREASE OF BEEF PRICES.

The price received by the farmer is one thing; the price paid by the consumer is far different. The distribution of farm products from the farm to consumers is elaborately organized, considerably involved and complicated, and burdened with costly features. These are exemplified in my report for 1909 by a statement of the results of a special investigation into the increased cost of fresh beef between the slaughterer and the consumer.

It was establish that in the North Atlantic States the consumer's price of beef was 31.4 per cent higher than the wholesale price received by the great slaughtering houses; 38 per cent higher in the South Atlantic States; and 39.4 per cent higher in the Western States. The average for the United States was 38 per cent.

It was found that the percentage of increase was usually lower in the larger cities than in the smaller ones and higher in the case of beef that is cheap at wholesale than of high-priced beef. It was a safe inference that the poorer people paid nearly twice the gross profit that the more well-to-do people paid.

THE DAIRYMAN GETS ONE-HALF THE MILK PRICE.

Another investigation into the increase of prices in the process of distribution was made in the last week of June, 1910. This time the object was to discover what fraction of the consumer's price was received by the farmer. It was a time of high prices, of high cost of living, and the aim was to ascertain to what extent the farmer received a return out of the high consumer's cost of farm products.

The investigation covered 78 cities scattered throughout the United States, and the information was contributed by a large number of the department's crop correspondents and by some of its special agents, who made inquiries in all of the 78 cities. The cities were divided into geographical groups for the purpose of computing averages, and these were combined into an average for the United States, all after proper weighting according to importance.

Milk was one of the commodities under investigation—a food product indispensable to a large fraction of the families of the Nation, and now a costly one to all consumers.

While it is true that the dairyman is receiving considerably more for his milk than he did before the present era of high prices, yet it was discovered in this investigation that throughout the United States he receives a scant 50 per cent, or one-half of the price paid by the consumer. The other half goes to the railway company for carriage, to the wholesale milk dealer, if there is one in the chain of distribution, and to the retailer who delivers at the consumer's door.

Freight charges for carrying milk vary according to distance, but their average may be regarded as approximately about 7 per cent of the consumer's price. With the farmer receiving about 50 per cent of that price and the railroads 7 per cent, the remaining 43 per cent of the consumer's price is received mostly by the retailer.

The milk wagon of the retailer has a long route. It stops at a house or two in one city block, perhaps passes several blocks without stopping, and so proceeds to serve customers thinly distributed along a route of miles. At the same time the milk wagons of other retailers are covering various portions of the same route, and so there is a great waste of effort and of expense in the distribution.

The division of States in which the cost of distributing milk from producer to consumer is the most is the North Central group, in which producers receive 44 per cent of the prices paid by the consumer. Next in order follow the Western States with 47 per cent, the North Atlantic States with 53 per cent, the South Central States with 55 per cent, and the South Atlantic States with 57 per cent.

The average price paid by consumers in the 78 cities is almost exactly 8 cents per quart. In the North Atlantic and North Central States the average is 7.5 cents; in the Western States, 8.9 cents; in the South Central, 9.1 cents; and in the South Atlantic States, 9.3 cents. These prices are for the last week in June, 1910.

BUTTER AND THE RETAILER.

Factory butter was included in this investigation of prices, in the three classes of creamery print, creamery tub, and renovated. Consumer's prices were taken in 78 cities in all parts of the country, and the facts were ascertained in the latter part of June, 1910.

In the distribution of creamery butter from factory to consumer the ultimate price includes the railway charge for transportation and the retailer's addition. The freight charge is about 0.6 of 1 per cent of the consumer's price.

As a general average for the 78 cities, the creamery receives 86.3 per cent of the consumer's price for creamery prints. The percentages are nearly the same in all geographic divisions, the lowest, 84.6 per cent, being found in the Western States, and the highest, 87.5 per cent, in the South Atlantic States.

In the case of creamery tub butter, the factories receive 86.5 per cent of the consumer's price in the 78 cities, the Western States again having the lowest percentage, 84.6 per cent. The highest percentage is 88 for the South Central States, and in the other divisions the percentage is between 86 and 87.

Factories that renovate butter receive a somewhat larger percentage of the consumer's price than in the case of creamery prints and tub butter. The average for the 78 cities is 88.3 per cent, with inconsiderable variations among the geographic divisions of the country.

EXHAUSTIVE INVESTIGATIONS.

The increase of price of farm products in their transfer from producer to consumer was thoroughly investigated in all parts of the country and for a large variety of products by the Industrial Commission. Although the facts obtained in that investigation are now about 10 years old, it is believed that the ratios between producer's and consumer's prices are approximately the same now as they were then. At any rate, it seems probable that the farmer is not now receiving a larger share of the consumer's price than he received 10 years ago, and he may be receiving a smaller share.

POULTRY.

Within the field of investigation it was found that poultry almost doubled in price between the farmer and the consumer; in other words, the farmer received only 55.1 per cent of the consumer's price. Inquiries were made concerning turkeys as distinct from other poultry, with the result that it was found that the farmers received 63.5 per cent of the final price. Chickens as a separate description are represented by the percentage of 68.4 when priced by the pound, and by 57.1 per cent when priced by the head.

Of the price per dozen paid by the consumer, the producer received 69 per cent in the case of eggs; dried beans, 75 per cent when bought by the bushel; cabbage, 48.1 per cent when bought by the head and 64.9 per cent when bought by the pound; cauliflower, 75 per cent when bought by the dozen; and celery, 60 per cent when bought by the bunch.

THE SMALLER THE RETAIL UNIT, THE LESS THE FARMER RECEIVES.

The general fact was that the producer's percentage of the consumer's price diminished as the quantity sold at retail was smaller. For instance, the apple grower received 55.6 per cent of the consumer's price when the consumer bought by the bushel and 66 per cent when the purchase was by the barrel. When the consumer bought corn by the bushel the farmer got 70.6 per cent of the price, but when the purchase was by the barrel the farmer received 81 per cent. The strawberry grower received 48.9 per cent of the consumer's price in purchases by the quart and 75.9 per cent in purchases by the crate. A still better illustration is found in the case of onions. In purchasing a peck at a time, the farmer received 27.8 per cent of the retail price; in purchases of a barrel, he received 58.3 per cent; and in purchases by the 100 pounds, he received 69 per cent. So in the case of oranges; when the purchase was by the dozen the grower received 20.3 per cent of the consumer's price, whereas when the purchase was by the box the grower received 59.3 per cent.

FACTS FOR MANY PRODUCTS.

Farmers received 83.3 per cent of the final price in the retail purchase of blackberries by the crate, 75 per cent in the purchase of cucumbers by the third of a bushel, 66.7 per cent in the purchase of eggplant by the crate, 60 per cent in the purchase of green peas by the quart, 70.5 per cent when hay was bought by the ton, and 82.2 per cent in the purchase of horses from retailers.

Among the many other products represented in this list are oats, with 73.6 per cent of the price going to the farmer when bought by the bushel; melons, 50 per cent when bought by the pound; parsnips, 60 per cent when bought by the bunch; potatoes, 59.3 per cent when bought by the bushel; string beans, 80 per cent when bought by the barrel; sweet potatoes, 60.8 per cent when bought by the barrel; turnips, 60 per cent in purchases by the bunch; watermelons, 33.5 per cent when bought singly.

In some cases there were purchasers from the farmer who were middlemen. It was found that cotton growers received 93 per cent of the price paid by cotton manufacturers for the raw cotton; 84.1 per cent of the price of broom corn paid by the broom manufacturers; 80 per cent of the price of calves and 91 per cent of the price of cattle paid by packers; 93 per cent of the price of hogs and 74.2 per cent of the price of lambs paid by packers; 87 per cent of the price of tobacco paid by the hogshead and 92.2 per cent when bought by the pound by manufacturers; 72.9 per cent in the case of wheat bought by millers; and 91.7 per cent in the case of wool bought by manufacturers.

FREIGHT CHARGES.

To the foregoing percentages that represent the share of the farmer in the consumer's price should be added the percentage standing for the freight charge in determining the share of the consumer's price that goes to the middlemen. With approximate accuracy it has been determined that when the farmer received 50 per cent of the consumer's price, the freight charge on butter is about 0.5 of 1 per cent of the consumer's price; eggs, 0.6 of 1 per cent; apples, 6.8 per cent; beans, 2.4 per cent; potatoes, 7.4 per cent; grain of all sorts, 3.8 per cent; hay, 7.9 per cent; cattle and hogs, 1.2 per cent; live poultry, 2.2 per cent; wool, 0.3 of 1 per cent. The foregoing allowances for freight are to be increased by one-half when the farmer receives about three-fourths of the consumer's price.

COFFEE PRICES.

The import statistics of the Department of Commerce and Labor afford some striking comparisons between the original value and consumer's price. In the fiscal year 1910 four-fifths of the coffee imported into the United States came from Brazil, 17 per cent from other countries in South and Central America and from Mexico, so that 97.2 per cent of the imports were from Mexico and Central and South America. About 0.1 of 1 per cent of the coffee imports are from Aden and are the nominal Mocha coffee, and 1.3 per cent of the imports are from the East Indies and are the Java coffee.

In 1910 the coffee imported from American countries, which was 97.2 per cent of all coffee imports, had an import value of 7.8 cents per pound. To this should be added the ocean freight rate. From Rio Janeiro the rate is 0.28 of 1 cent, or about one-fourth of a cent per pound. For nearly all of this American coffee the consumers paid prices ranging from 20 to 35 cents per pound. In other words, the import value, plus the ocean freight charge, is only from 23 to 40 per cent of the principal range of prices paid for the coffee at retail.

PRICES PAID FOR TEA.

Tea may be referred to in the same way. In the fiscal year 1910 the average import value of tea was 16 cents per pound. It is assumed that nearly all of the tea consumed in this country is bought at retail prices ranging from 50 to 70 cents per pound, and, with this understanding, the import value of tea is from 23 per cent to 32 per cent of what the consumer pays.

CONSUMER'S PRICE AS AN INCREASE OF FARMER'S PRICE—PRICE GAINS FROM ANOTHER POINT OF VIEW.

In the consideration of this subject so far the aspect has been that of the producer; the farmer thinks of the price that the consumer pays for farm products and compares with them the price that he himself receives.

While the farmer is looking forward with regard to the prices of his products, the consumer is looking backard, and so regards the prices that he pays as increases upon what the farmer gets. This aspect of the matter may now be worth some attention.

It is established by the investigation of this department made last June that the milk consumers of 78 cities paid for milk an increase of 100.8 per cent above the price received by dairymen; in other words, the farmer's price was fully doubled. The lowest increase among the geographic divisions was 75.5 per cent in the South Atlantic States and the highest was 111.9 per cent in the Western States.

In the purchase of butter the consumer pays 15.8 per cent above the factory price in the case of creamery prints, 15.6 per cent above in the case of factory tub, and 13.3 per cent above the factory price in the case of renovated butter. The percentages of increase among the five divisions of States do not vary much from the averages for the United States.

Some large percentages of increase of prices were found by the Industrial Commission—135.3 per cent for cabbage bought by the head; 100 per cent for melons bought by the pound, for buttermilk sold by the quart, and for oranges sold by the crate; 260 per cent for onions bought by the peck; 400.4 per cent for oranges bought by the dozen; 111.1 per cent for strawberries bought by the quart; and 200 per cent for watermelons sold singly.

There were many cases of increase of consumer's price over farmer's price amounting to 75 per cent and over, but under 100 per cent, and among these were 90.5 per cent for apples bought by the barrel and 80.6 per cent for apples bought by the box; 75 per cent for chickens bought by the head; 83.4 per cent for onions bought by the pound; 80.5 per cent for potatoes bought by the bushel; 88.8 per cent for poultry, in general, bought by the pound; 95.8 per cent for strawberries bought by the box; 82.5 per cent for sweet potatoes bought by the bushel.

It may be worth while to extend the list of farm products that are sold to consumers at a large increase above farm prices. In the class of commodities selling for an increase of price amounting to 50 per cent and over but under 75 per cent above farm prices may be mentioned the following increases: 61.8 per cent for cabbage bought by the pound; 66.7 per cent for celery bought by the bunch, turnips and parsnips bought by the bunch, and green peas bought by the quart; 54.4 per cent for chickens bought by the pound; 50 per cent for eggplants bought by the crate; 68.4 per cent for onions bought by the bushel; 68.7 per cent for oranges bought by the box; 60 per cent for potatoes bought by the peck; 59.8 per cent for turkeys bought by the pound.

The import price of coffee in the fiscal year 1910, which was 8 cents a pound, after the increase to 20 and 35 cents per pound to the retailer, has risen in price to the consumer from 150 to 337.5 per cent. So with tea of the same fiscal year; its import price of 16 cents per pound, after being increased to 50 to 70 cents per pound, cost the consumer an advance of 212.55 to 337.5 per cent.

Before assigning to middlemen the various increases of prices, it is proper to deduct the percentages due to freight rates. The freight charge for milk received in New York is about 18 per cent of the producer's price and in Chicago about 14.7 per cent. Of the import price of coffee, the ocean freight charge from Rio Janeiro is 3.6 per cent. The percentages of farm price for which freight charges stand in the United States may be estimated at approximately 0.9 of 1 per cent of the factory price for butter; 1.2 per cent of the farm price for clover seed; 1.6 per cent for cotton; 1.3 per cent for eggs; 13.6 per cent for apples; 4.8 per cent for beans; 14.8 per cent for potatoes; and 5 per cent for sweet potatoes. The rates for oats, rye, barley, and wheat are nearly the same, ranging from 6 per cent for oats to 7.3 per cent for barley and rye. The rate for corn is 9.2 per cent and the average for all grain is 7.7 per cent. For hay the percentage is 15.8 per cent; for cattle and hogs, 2.5 per cent; for live poultry, 4.5 per cent; and for wool, 0.6 of 1 per cent.

NO GROUND FOR COMPLAINT AGAINST THE FARMER.

From the details that have been presented with regard to the increase of the prices of farm products between farmer and consumer, the conclusion is inevitable that the consumer has no well-grounded complaint against the farmer for the prices that he pays. The farmer supplies the capital for production and takes the risk of his losses; his crops are at the mercy of drought and flood and heat and frost, to say nothing of noxious insects and blighting diseases. He supplies hard, exacting, unremitting labor. A degree and range of information and intelligence are demanded by agriculture which are hardly equaled in any other occupation. Then there is the risk of overproduction and disastrously low prices. From beginning to end the farmer must steer dextrously to escape perils to his profits and, indeed, to his capital on every hand. At last the products are started on their way to the consumer. The railroad, generally speaking, adds a percentage of increase to the farmer's prices that is not large. After delivery by the railroad the products are stored a short time, are measured into the various retail quantities—more or less small—and the dealers are rid of them as soon as possible. The dealers have risks that are practically small, except credit sales and such risks as grow out of their trying to do an amount of business which is small as compared with their number.

PROBLEM FOR CONSUMERS AND NOT FARMERS TO REMEDY.

After consideration of the elements of the matter, it is plain that the farmer is not getting an exorbitant price for his products, and that the cost of distribution from the time of delivery at destination by the railroad to delivery to the consumer is the feature of the problem of high prices which must present itself to the consumer for treatment.

Why do not consumers buy directly from the farmers? A distribution of farm products in this simple way has already begun in England, where cooperative organizations of farmers are selling by direct consignment to cooperative organizations of consumers in cities.

Farmers' cooperative selling associations are numerous in this country, but cooperative buying associations among the people of cities and towns are few. Aside from buying associations maintained by farmers, hardly any exist in this country. It is apparent, therefore, that the consumer has much to do to work out his own salvation with regard to the prices that he pays. Potatoes were selling last spring in some places where there had been overproduction for 20 cents and in some places for even 9 cents per bushel at the farm, while at the same time city consumers in the East were paying 50 to 75 cents per bushel, although there was nothing to prevent them from combining to buy a carload or more of potatoes directly from the grower and for delivery directly to themselves.

POPULATION, CROP YIELDS, AND PRICES—PRODUCTION PER ACRE OVERTAKING INCREASE OF PEOPLE—IMMIGRATION AND BIRTH RATE.

The population of the United States has increased rapidly in the past. Our doors have always stood open to immigrants from other lands. Our ancestors had large families. Our numbers have increased one-third every 10 years until 1880, and afterwards one-fourth to one-fifth. Our expanding farm area has easily provided sustenance for our increasing numbers. But with the filling up of our unoccupied spaces some have begun to fear that in the near future we shall be unable to provide all our food from our own fields. Population increases; yields decrease (so it is said), and the time is at hand when we shall have to import foodstuffs; our economic independence will then be gone.

Immigration, however, is not to be counted upon permanently to furnish any considerable annual increase in our numbers. Three-fourths of a million may enter our ports in one year; but the very next year may see a financial depression, with the tide of emigration setting away from our shores. Only the birth rate may be counted upon as a permanent force acting toward increasing the population; and the increase of the native-born population by excess of births over deaths in this country is only about 1¼ per cent a year, with a tendency toward a decreasing birth rate.

The great question, then, is this: Are the products of our agricultural lands increasing or decreasing in quantity? Is the yield per acre of our fields keeping pace with this normal increase of population by births? To the latter question the answer is that the process has begun.

RISING YIELDS PER ACRE.

Dividing the period from 1866 to 1909 into four decades and a succeeding short period of four years, the yield per acre of corn is shown by a study made in the Bureau of Statistics to have declined 2.3 per cent from the first decade to the second, declined 8.2 per cent from the second to the third, increased 7.7 per cent from the third to the fourth, and increased 7.1 per cent from the fourth decade to the succeeding four-year period.

For wheat an even better showing is made, since the figures show a continuous increase in yield per acre, namely, 3.4 per cent from first decade to second, 3.3 from second to third, 6.3 from third to fourth, and 9.6 from fourth decade to final four-year period.

For cotton, the first figure, 2.8, is a decline, but the rest are increases, namely, 2.6, 3.8, and 0.3.

For tobacco, the first figure, 3.4, is an increase; the second, 2.0, is a decline; the third, 5.2, is an increase; and so also is the last, 9.7.

Similar facts are shown for 6 other leading crops, namely, oats, barley, rye, buckwheat, hay, and potatoes. Not one of the 10 crops named declined in yield per acre from the third decade to the fourth, while oats was the only one to show a decline from the fourth decade to the last period of four years. The evidence is very plain that the yields per acre of our crops are now increasing, and if the facts were assembled in detail for the States it would be found that the percentage of increase in yield in many of them is greater than the percentage of normal increase in population; that is, the increase by births over deaths in the old native element.

Such is the fact with regard to wheat for the fourth decade, as compared with the preceding one, in 26 States, and 2 of the States are all but ready to joint them. In 14 States corn production per acre has increased faster than the normal increase of population, and this is almost true of 5 more States. The number of States in this list in the case of barley is 21; rye, 30; buckwheat, 19; cotton, 3; potatoes, 24; hay, 35; and more or less States are almost ready to enter this list in the case of all crops.

A demand that is more difficult to fulfill in production per acre is for an increase that equals or exceeds the actual increase of population, including the immigrants and the temporarily high birth rate of the foreign born. But, notwithstanding the fact that this difficulty is greater in the United States than it is in all other countries that have practically ceased to take much new land into cultivation, many of the States of this Nation are each maintaining an increase of production in the case of one or more prominent crops that is greater than the actual increase of population. Ten States are doing this in the case of corn; for wheat the number is 22; for oats, 16; for cotton and tobacco, 1 each; for rye, 21; for potatoes, 15; and for hay, 25.

We can not look for any other result than that the yields per acre of all our crops shall increase at an even faster rate in the future, in view of the intense interest with which our people are turning their attention toward agricultural improvement. If there are certain forces at work which, if unchecked and made more prevalent, will in the future compel us to bid against the world for food, the counteracting forces have nevertheless been already set in motion, with the promise of increasing effect.

INCOME PER ACRE.

The farmer has benefited more than others from the changed conditions which have manifested themselves in increased cost of living. For instance, the product of 1 acre of corn in 1899 was worth on the farm $8.51, but 10 years later it was worth $15.20, an increase in farm value amounting to 78.6 per cent. Similarly, wheat increased in farm value 114 per cent, tobacco 56.2 per cent, and cotton 65.6 per cent. Ten leading crops taken together—including, besides those mentioned, oats, barley, rye, buckwheat, potatoes, and hay—increased 72.7 per cent in farm value.

This, of course, is no advantage to the farmer if the increase in price of the things he has to buy is still greater. To ascertain the facts in this matter, the Bureau of Statistics sent a letter to a large number of retail dealers doing business with farmers. These dealers were asked to quote the prices which prevailed in 1899 and in 1909, taking care to compare articles of the same grades. In this way the percentage of increase in the prices of about 85 articles commonly used by farmers was determined.

In three cases the prices were less in 1909 than in 1899; in four cases they were the same; but in all other cases they had increased, the increases running from 2.7 per cent in the case of manure spreaders and mowers to 53.8 per cent in the case of brooms. Coffee increased 9.8 per cent; flour, 32.4; salt, 14.9; sugar, 8.7; overalls, 22.9; rubber boots, 29; calico, 26.9; muslin, 25; and so on. For all the articles considered the average increase was 12.1 per cent.

Now, compare this with the 72.7 per cent increase in the farm value of the 10 leading crops. The farmer has evidently benefited more than the rest of the community—taken all together—from the changes in values.

Put the facts in another way. The produce of 1 acre of corn was equal in value to 1.8 barrels of flour in 1899, but to 2.4 barrels in 1909; or it would buy 118.2 yards of muslin in 1899 and 168.9 yards in 1909. The average purchasing power of all crops similarly increased from 2 barrels of flour in 1899 to 2.6 barrels in 1909, and from 132.1 yards of muslin in 1899 to 182.4 yards in 1909. And so with the whole list of articles used by farmers.

The facts may also be put in the form of percentages by letting 100 represent the purchasing power of 1 acre of farm crops in 1899. Then, in 1909 the purchasing power of 1 acre of corn is seen to have increased 90 per cent when spent for coal oil, 62 for coffee, 33 for flour, and 64 for sugar. Now, take the average purchasing power of all crops. It increased 83 per cent when spent for coal oil, 57 for coffee, 30 for flour, 59 for sugar, and so on down the list. Taking the average of all articles, corn increased 60 per cent in purchasing power, wheat 91, and cotton 48, while the grand average increase in purchasing power of all crops is 54 per cent. In other words, the farmer has received a 54 per cent benefit from the changed conditions.

No one can pretend to understand all the forces at work in these matters. Possibly the farmer's present advantage is due, in part, to temporary conditions of supply and demand that may change to his disadvantage. If it is also due, in part, to a greater appreciation of the value of the farmer's work, that, too, is something upon which no calculations can be based.

But there is no sort of doubt that a great part of the farmer's prosperity rests upon the bedrock of a greater output, a higher yield per acre. That is to say, farmers and farming have become more efficient, not only to the benefit of the farmer himself but also to the safeguarding of our national independence. The wisdom of Congress in aiding agriculture in the past, through the Federal Department and the State colleges and experiment stations, as well as the advisability of giving even greater fostering attention in the future to our most fundamental industry, is thus made plainly manifest.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FULLER].

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Chairman, like the gentleman from Alabama, my friend Judge CLAYTON, who first addressed the House this morning, I am extremely gratified that there is so large and intelligent an audience here at this time. [Laughter and applause.]

I think that fact is perhaps occasioned by reason of some one having given out the information that I was to endeavor at this time to make a speech upon this bill, and it being about the usual lunch hour the pangs of hunger may have overcome in the minds of many of the Members the thirst for intellectual entertainment. [Applause.] I regret exceedingly, under the circumstances, that I have not any carefully prepared remarks for this occasion, and I do not know that it will be possible for me to add anything of interest to the discussion that has been going on in this House for the past two weeks upon this bill, and I do not know whether we are any of us being enlightened so very much ourselves, or whether we are enlightening the country at all upon the tariff question. It is not an entirely new question, and yet it seems that an academic discussion of the principle of protection as opposed to the principle of free trade is now on the boards as of old, and must, from the necessities of the times and the political conditions prevailing, again demand our attention and the attention of the country. The President of the United States, under the authority given him by the Constitution and with the highest and purest motives of duty and patriotism, called this Congress together for a single purpose; and that purpose was to pass upon the trade agreement that under his direction had been tentatively made with the Dominion of Canada. It seems to me that it would have been wise if this Congress, under the circumstances, had foregone the opportunity to play politics and had disposed of that one question and adjourned and gone home. I know that course would have been for the benefit of all the people of the country, and I think would have commanded their unanimous approval. This running amuck with the business interests of the country is what might have been expected from past experience and past history when the Democratic Party has been in control of this House, and, so far as I have observed in the past, that course has never led to anything of advantage to the people of this country. So far as the reciprocity agreement, or the bill carrying that agreement into effect, was concerned, I can easily see how the Democrats might differ among themselves as to the policy of that bill, and I can also see how some Republicans might favor it and how some might not. For myself, I believe, and have long believed, in the principle of reciprocity and in reciprocal trade agreements with other nations.

I believe that when we open up our markets to the other countries of the world, we ought by some sort of reciprocal arrangement, to get some benefit ourselves for so doing [applause], some equivalent for what we give; and I am eternally opposed to the Democratic doctrine of free trade, because I believe most emphatically in American markets for Americans. [Applause.] I believe in protection to all American industries and to American labor, and that our own people should have the preference in our own markets at all times, and that if we yield anything as to that policy, we ought to get an equivalent for it. I believe that the agreement which this House, so far as it is concerned, has ratified with the Dominion of Canada will, if consummated, be to the material benefit of both countries. I do not believe that it will injure the farmers of this country or any class of our people. If I did so believe, I would not be in favor of it. I have some interests myself connected with the farming industry, and I represent here a great agricultural district, one of the greatest in the United States; and I fully and firmly believe that the interests of the agricultural population of my district will be materially benefited by the consummation of this Canadian reciprocity agreement. At the same time, I realize that I also represent other industries than that of agriculture alone, for that district is also one of the greatest manufacturing districts of the country, and has within its boundaries substantially every manufacturing industry that exists in the land, and substantially every item in the Canadian reciprocity bill, and every item in this free list or free-trade bill, is produced to a greater or less extent in my district. We there manufacture each year, millions of dollars worth of agricultural machinery and implements, sewing machines, and fence wire, besides pretty nearly everything else that can be manufactured or produced in this country. I regret that my distinguished and eloquent friend and colleague from Illinois [Mr. PRINCE] should have seen fit to characterize the reciprocity agreement as an indication of the desire of the people of this country to be annexed to Canada, or for Canada to be annexed to the United States, whichever way you choose to put it, because there is just as much danger in the one case as in the other. [Laughter and applause.]

Also my genial friend and colleague from Chicago, Mr. MADDEN, had something to say about Canadian annexation and the flag of this Union floating all the way from the Great Lakes to the North Pole, discovered by Dr. Cook. [Laughter and applause.] Now, I want to assure both of my colleagues that I do not think there is any danger of Canadian annexation or any intention whatever or any desire on the part of the people of this country for annexation at any time in the future, and I do not think it will come until long years after our enthusiastic friend from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] has fought to a finish his fight with Japan and wiped the Mikado and all his subjects from off the face of the earth, or off from the waters of the sea, whichever it may be. [Laughter and applause.] The time may come, and I am not sure but what it will come, when the dominions to the north of us will constitute an independent republic and when a new flag of freedom will float over all that great land from our northern border to the frozen seas of the north. That time, I say, may come, but annexation never, and all this talk of annexation is nothing more nor less than sensational bosh. The people of Canada are our friends; we have no designs upon their Government or their territory but to wish them well. Our relations can never be anything but friendly, and commercial reciprocity between Canada and the United States is in accordance with natural law and can only result for the good of the people there and here. Who would claim for a moment that unrestricted trade between our great grain-producing States in the Northwest and the other States of the Union is to the detriment of the other States. If it were possible that Minnesota and the Dakotas and Montana might be separated from the United States, and if we had a tariff barrier against their products, their grain, and their cattle, would either we or they be better off? Manifestly not. This reciprocity agreement only applies to a limited extent the same rules as to exchange of products with Canada that we now have between the several States. I would, if I could, wipe out all the trade barriers between Canada and the United States and have unrestricted trade in all the products of the soil and in all manufactures and all commodities of every name and kind the same as we have here between the several States. To my understanding, reciprocity is the natural sequence to the Republican policy of protection, and the two should go hand in hand together. Reciprocity was advocated by Blaine and McKinley and the other great Republican leaders of the past. If the Democratic Party have now taken it up, they have simply followed the wisdom of past Republican leaders and adopted past Republican platforms.

The Democratic majority in this House seem to now have taken up this doctrine of reciprocity and are supporting it with great enthusiasm. As I have read the Democratic platforms in the past I have understood that that party claimed always that all protection was robbery, and that reciprocity was only another name for protection. That that has been the doctrine of the Democratic Party, and is to-day the real belief of many of its leaders is confirmed by the speeches we have heard from that side of the House from day to day in support of the bill now pending. Let us stop and consider for a moment how wholly inconsistent the Canadian reciprocity measure is with the free-trade bill now under consideration. For, call it a farmers' free-list bill or whatever you will, this bill now under consideration is nothing more nor less than an absolute free-trade measure. There is no protection in it for any industry, and there is no reciprocity in it. In effect, the Democratic Party in this House are now saying to Canada, we have passed the reciprocity bill, but you need not ratify it there because we propose to give you more than you ask by subsequent bills and to ask nothing from you in return. That is to say, we will put on the free list, not only as to Canada, but as to all the countries of the earth, the very articles upon which we have just ratified a reciprocal arrangement for mutual duties. What consistency can there be in ratifying an agreement with Canada which fixes a certain rate of duty upon meats, agricultural implements and other commodities, reciprocal as to each country, and then before that agreement becomes effective, follow up immediately with a free-trade bill proposing to put those same things on the free list without any concessions whatever from the other contracting party. Is not this the height of Democratic inconsistency? Are you simply using this reciprocity measure, proposed by a Republican President, for the sole and only purpose of making political capital and for the purpose of having that agreement not ratified by Canada, because, if your policy prevails, they can then have our markets free without any concession whatever? Now, I thought awhile ago, and I do not know but I said once upon the floor of this House, that I believed it would be a good idea when the tariff was revised, that it might be revised schedule by schedule and one thing at a time. I have changed my mind about that. This bill shows how such a policy would work, and it is very much like cutting off the dog's head by commencing at his tail and cutting off an inch at a time. This bill shows an intention on the part of the Democratic majority in this House to ruin certain industries one at a time, and to put certain articles a few at a time upon the free list without any protection whatever, and then to follow it up with some other articles one at a time, until the doctrine of free trade is universally established as the policy of the country and the policy of protection is gone forever.

My learned friend, the distinguished gentleman from Alabama, Judge CLAYTON, this morning said very truly that the line of demarcation between the Republican Party and the Democratic Party was never more clearly drawn than it is to-day; that the Republican Party was the party of protection and the Democratic Party for free trade or tariff for revenue only. That is absolutely true. No man with a drop of Republican blood in his veins can justify himself in voting for this free-trade measure. [Applause on the Republican side.]

This bill, it will be observed, is a free-trade bill, pure and simple—at least simple. It is not even a "tariff-for-revenue-only" bill. It never could produce any revenue whatever for the Government, because it does not propose to reduce the rates of duty, but to admit all the articles mentioned absolutely free of duty. Under the Dingley law the duty on sewing machines was 45 per cent; the Payne law reduced this duty to 30 per cent. This bill puts sewing machines on the free list, not to permit competition with foreign-made machines, but to give an actual advantage to the foreign manufacturer, and thus seriously handicap, if not entirely ruin, a great home industry. Substantially, the same is true as to the shoe and leather industry. Why, in the name of reason, if our Democratic friends consider the duties too high, do they not propose to reduce them to what they consider a revenue basis, rather than deprive the Government of all revenue and the home industry of all protection?

That is the proposition before us to-day. That is the proposition upon which both political parties are to go before the country. It is the policy of protection to American industry and American labor on the one hand, that has made this country the most prosperous upon the face of the earth, or, on the other hand, it is the policy that has always brought stagnation in business and ruin and desolation to our people, the policy of Democratic free trade. It is proved now, so that there can be no misunderstanding about it, that the Democratic Party of to-day, as it always has been in the past, is a party of free trade; that if it was in power in all of the departments of Government, and could do so, it would level every customhouse in the land, and allow all foreign products to enter and compete in our home markets in competition with our own people and without requiring any tariff tax or payment of any kind for that great privilege.

Oh, my Democratic friends, when the people of this country understand your purpose, when they understand that that is the doctrine you are advocating piece by piece, they will again relegate you to the rear, and they will again reinstate in all the departments of this Government that party that has made this country the most progressive and the most prosperous upon the face of the earth. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Let me cite you to one little thing—a little joker, so to speak—they put in this so-called farmers' free-list bill. I wonder why they call it a farmers' free-list bill. Have you done some injury to the farmer for which you propose to recompense him? You seem at least to not have done or proposed anything that by any possibility could injure any farmers south of Mason and Dixon's line. I observe that you do not put rice and peanuts and oranges and pineapples and other products of the South upon the free list, but instead, in order to fool the people, you pick out here and there some industry in the Northern States, not in the South, that you think it safe to attack, and say "If we can pass that and wipe that industry out of existence every section of the country interested in that industry will join us and demand the same treatment for such other industries as we may wish to attack." Among the items selected and put upon the free list in this bill is sewing machines. I wonder why you put sewing machines upon the free list in this bill and why this one industry was selected for your attack. I presume it is probably true that there is not a sewing-machine factory in the entire South and consequently you will find no opposition in that section of the country to free trade in sewing machines, but why did you not propose to put all other kindred machines, such as typewriters, knitting machines, and everything else of that same nature upon the free list also by this bill? True, there are not many sewing-machine factories in this country, very few of them. Perhaps you thought you would not antagonize very many localities by singling out sewing machines for your attack.

Now, it so happens, Mr. Chairman, that I come from a little town in the State of Illinois that is known far and near as the sewing-machine town. The little city of Belvidere, with a population of between seven and eight thousand people, has one of the largest independent sewing-machine factories in this country. The National Sewing Machine Co. in that town employs on an average probably a thousand men, and is the support of at least one-half the entire population of that little city; and under this bill you propose to put sewing machines on the free list without any reason whatever being given for so doing, so far as I can understand.

I do not understand that there is any such thing as a sewing-machine trust in this country. I know that the company in my town is not connected with any trust or any other company anywhere in the world. It is an independent factory, doing a large and fairly profitable business, although the profit on each sewing machine made, under the competition that exists, is so small as to be a mere trifle. There is one large sewing machine concern known as the Singer Co., and sometimes called the sewing-machine trust, although I do not understand that it is a trust or that it has connection with subsidiary concerns; but that great company probably manufactures more than 60 per cent of all the sewing machines made in the world. It has factories in several places in the United States. It has factories in Canada and in Scotland, and, I think, in other countries of Europe. It would not be affected at all by placing sewing machines upon the free list, because it could manufacture the same machines in its factories abroad with cheap foreign labor and send those machines into this country free of duty and at prices that would crush out absolutely every independent sewing-machine concern in the land. There is but one other country, under present conditions, that could compete with us in the manufacture of sewing machines, and that is Germany. I understand that sewing machines are manufactured there on a large scale and that labor is very much cheaper than it is here, and without any tariff protection they could send their machines into the United States duty free and crush out of existence every sewing-machine company in the land except the Singer Co., which would be their only competitor, and all that, too, without making sewing machines any cheaper to the purchaser than they are to-day; and that is what would happen should this bill become a law in its present form—if our Democratic friends succeed in getting it passed and upon the statute books, which I do not believe they even hope to do. There is very little profit in sewing machines now made by these independent concerns in competition with the Singer Co. The independent concerns sell their machines to dealers, and they are again sold at very low prices. If you will take up a catalogue of one of the great department stores or mail-order houses, you will find there the prices at which such sewing machines as are made in my district are sold. Two of the largest mail-order houses, perhaps, are in Chicago, namely, Montgomery Ward & Co. and Sears, Roebuck & Co. If you will examine their catalogues, you will find that you can buy a first-class sewing machine at retail at from $8 to $21, and the machine, Mr. Chairman, that is sold by these houses at retail to-day for $8 is as good a machine in every respect as my mother paid $100 for when I was a boy. If you want a fancy piece of furniture in addition to the sewing machine, you can pay as high as $21 to one of these concerns for such a machine.

The Singer Co. does business on entirely a different plan. They sell their machines through agents all over the country and on time, with payments of from 50 cents a week to a dollar a month, or something of that kind. They have great capital and can afford to do business in that way, and thereby they get higher prices for their machines. It would not affect that company a particle to put sewing machines on the free list, but it would crush out absolutely the one great industry of my town and county and throw out of employment in that little town a thousand men, while half the people of the town would be deprived of a livelihood and forced to seek other employment. Now, Mr. Chairman, this is only one example of what our Democratic friends are proposing to do by the passage of this bill. It is only one industry that is picked out for attack, but if we are to believe what they tell us it is to be followed up by attacking other industries, one at a time, all along the line, until no vestige of protection shall be left and until foreign countries may send their manufactured products into the United States without let or hindrance in competition with our own industries, and thereby force out of employment our own people, who are now the best-paid laboring people in the world. Is that what we want? They tell us in the report on this so-called farmers' free list bill that its passage would reduce the revenues of the Government something over $10,000,000 a year, and, Mr. Chairman, the revenue we should lose is nothing compared to the greater injury that would necessarily follow. Ten million dollars' reduction in the revenues of the country is, of course, no small item, but we could stand that if it were not for the fact that under the free-trade provisions of this bill hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of manufactured products from abroad each year, made by the cheap labor of other countries, would come into the United States in competition with our own industries, and that just so much less would be manufactured in our own factories and by our own people, so that necessarily thousands and hundreds of thousands of laborers who are dependent upon the success of American industries and American factories would be forced to seek other employment or to accept a very great reduction in wages, and possibly both. That is what the Democratic Party in this House, under its present leadership, is proposing to do to the American people. It is only a beginning, but already we can see what the effects are sure to be.

My time is almost up, and before I get through I desire to say a few words in regard to some remarks made by my good friend from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] the other day. He is honest and sincere and means what he says. He seems to think that one evil of the protective system is that it provides means whereby the Government may pay pensions to its old soldiers, and that does not seem to please him. Let me quote from what he said in his speech the other day:

> But as I said when I started out, we are not limited to a tariff tax; we can resort to other taxes, as we have resorted to other taxes. Internal revenue brings, I believe, something over $300,000,000. The corporation tax brought over $25,000,000 last year. Now, my friends, there is going to be a demand, I suppose, for the passage of a general pension bill, to increase the pensions of the soldiers, which will run into many millions of dollars. I have no criticism to make of the motives behind it. There were not enough gentlemen to get an aye-and-no vote in opposition to the bill that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FULLER] presented in the last Congress. If we are going to increase any kind of an expenditure by millions of dollars, we have got to raise revenue by millions of dollars to meet it. Now, there is going to come business stagnation.

Is that what you are working for? Is that what is proposed in the passage of this bill. Let me go on. I quote again from Mr. SIMS's speech:

> Now, there is going to come business stagnation. It will be impossible to avoid it. * * * You may just as well get ready for it.

Yes; that is what the Democratic majority of this House promises us, is it? Business stagnation. Yes; I am afraid it is going to come. I know, and every man in this House knows, that it is already on its way, as you can find by looking up the reports of business concerns all over the country to-day. The very threat that you make to take off tariff duties, to reduce the revenues, to wipe out of existence boot and shoe factories and sewing-machine factories and other industries, the very threat that you make to inaugurate your doctrine of free trade is already bringing business stagnation throughout this country. Oh, yes; if you have your way and the old soldiers are paid the pensions which they ought to be paid, we shall have to issue bonds, or shall have to increase the internal-revenue taxes, or we shall have to impose a stamp tax, as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] says.

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. FULLER. Yes; I yield for a question.

Mr. SIMS. In order to have that pension law passed, if the revenues from imports are not sufficient, would you be willing to increase the internal-revenue taxes in order to do it? Would you?

Mr. FULLER. Yes; if that became necessary. I am willing to raise taxes in any way necessary or that may be possible to pay the debt we owe to the defenders of this Nation. [Applause on the Republican side.]

But, Mr. Chairman, I am in favor rather of raising the revenues by the indirect method of taxation upon imports, so that no man in all this country will feel that he is burdened with a tax, as he would feel it if the tax collector were to come around and ask him to plank down so much money.

Mr. SIMS. Is not the tax on whisky and on beer and on tobacco and on cigars an indirect tax?

Mr. FULLER. Certainly; it is an internal-revenue tax, levied on certain industries of this country. I am willing to increase that tax at any time when it may be necessary.

Mr. SIMS. Nobody pays it directly.

Mr. FULLER. But I say here and now that I am not willing to enter upon a period of business stagnation such as you say is sure to come for the purpose of not having revenue enough to pay the pensions that we owe to the old soldiers. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman just one more question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULLER. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. I will ask the gentleman if he is opposed to revising any of the schedules of the tariff so as to reduce it at all, and if he would reduce it at all, would it not to some extent bring about the stagnation I have referred to?

Mr. FULLER. I will say that if you gentlemen on the other side of the House had not entered upon a filibuster upon the last day of the last session of the Sixty-first Congress, we would now have had an expert tariff commission and provision would have been made to revise the schedules of the tariff law from time to time in a scientific manner so as not to interfere with any of the industries of this country. That is what I am in favor of. [Applause on the Republican side.] I am not in favor of firing in here a bill of this kind that has never even been considered in committee and where there are no figures or statistics to support it. I am not in favor, simply to play politics, of picking out one little industry here and there, such as exists in my town, and say we will wipe that out and tell the people of this country how we are revising the tariff downward in the interest of the people. If you want to revise the tariff, go at it systematically and act upon some consistent and definite theory. I want to say to you now that I am opposed forever to what you call a revenue tariff or a free-trade tariff. I am not opposed to revising the schedules whenever they need revision, so as to equalize duties upon all products and treat all industries, all classes, and all sections of this country alike. I am in favor of just such a tariff as we have had heretofore. Just such a tariff as has built up the industries of this country and made us what we are to-day, and I agree most emphatically with the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] that the line is drawn so that no man claiming to be a Republican can for one moment think of joining in this policy of destruction that you gentlemen on the Democratic side of this House are now proposing. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Chairman, this is a great question which has been thrashed out time and again and will be discussed time and again in the future. There is a great deal of information yet to be had upon the question that we do not now have. I do not say that I am not in favor of revising certain schedules of the tariff and reducing the tariff upon certain articles, or of adjusting the tariff from time to time according to just and proper conditions. But I do insist that at all times when revision is made, it shall be scientifically done, and so as to not unjustly injure any American industry. I desire to see a permanent nonpartisan tariff commission, but at the same time I will never, while I live, consent to the passage of any bill upon the tariff question that does not maintain the principle of protection to American industries and American labor. I am unalterably and forever opposed to the doctrine of free trade. [Applause on the Republican side.] That doctrine which, whenever and wherever tried, has brought about stagnation in business, closed factories, made idle laboring men, hard times, ruin, and desolation. This is what the Democratic Party offers us now. I prefer the Republican doctrine of protection, that has always given us prosperity, employment, and good wages, prosperous farms and factories, and millions of happy homes. It is a good time for all Republicans to get back to the solid foundation of reason and common sense. [Applause.]

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, for some days we have listened with great interest to the discussion of what has been denominated a "farmers' tariff bill," and it has not all been wasted effort, even though Carlyle declared "Silence is the eternal duty of man," and that "England and America are going to nothing but wind and tongue." There has been every courtesy, as well as "reciprocity," extended on both sides, wide apart as may be the declaimers from unanimous agreement, and instructive and pleasurable have been the discourses to audiences in the galleries, notwithstanding the fact that one authority said he "felt intensely the social misery which a single declaimer with a powerful memory, leathern lungs, and a fluent tongue may inflict on the public."

In my home town in Pennsylvania some years ago we had a Republican club, and the president of the club was an ambitious young man named Showers. The president was a great believer in the efficiency of public meetings and held them whenever he thought an audience could be drummed up. On one occasion we had there as the orator of the evening Mr. Warwick, then mayor of Philadelphia. In introducing the mayor

Mr. Showers stepped into the spot light, put his best foot forward, and said:

Ladies and gentlemen, before presenting the speaker of the evening I wish to say a word about contrasting conditions under two national administrations. Under the administration of President Harrison you saw the mills and factories booming, employment for everybody, peace and contentment everywhere, while prosperity crossed every man's dooryard and took a seat by the glowing hearthstone of everybody's home. Under the administration of Grover Cleveland you witnessed closed shops and forges, smokeless stacks, an empty Federal Treasury, and honorable citizenship driven into the street without work, almshouses filled, soupkouses overflowing, and gloom and despair written across the horizon with every setting sun. Now, which do you prefer? I think not.

[Laughter and applause.]

To-day, after weighing what I have heard on both sides of this "phony" bill, like Mr. Showers, I am constrained to say concerning this measure, I think not. And while a poet has seen fit to refer to oratory as merely "mouthfuls of spoken wind," it may be nearly so in estimating or measuring results, since a distinguished Member on the Democratic side has given notice by stronger assertion than mere inference or innuendo that this bill is a Democratic campaign document and a little political joker. This measure provides for a reduced tariff, and, of course, reduced revenue must follow, and it must also be a fact that every manufactured article imported from another country displaces that much production and labor in this country and sends the cost price in gold abroad.

After hearing what I have on both sides of this, I do not believe that the Democrats themselves regard it as the kind of a bill they would want to pass if they felt that it would be enacted. Having had notice that it is not to pass, I am not reflecting upon anybody's intelligence, but I rather compliment the Democrats when I say that I look upon it as a farce and a fraud, because it is not seriously considered; and surely it is an imposition upon the people and their time and their patience and a waste of money, if it is true that it costs $10,000 an hour, for the Members of this body to discuss a bill that is not intended to be enacted into law. So, like Mr. Showers, I think not. For one, instead of going into the merits or demerits of something that has no merit, I will pass on to another phase of this question and allow this to go, as I think should have been done at the start, paying no attention whatever to it, allowing the Democrats to talk and talk away the time, without making reply from this side.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, statements are frequently made here by Members, which are carelessly made, just like the one the gentleman has made about the debate on this bill costing $10,000 an hour. We are all paid the same salary, whether Congress is in session or not. Is not the gentleman willing to modify his remark, because it conveys the idea that in sitting here and debating this bill we are wasting an enormous amount of money, when the expense would be just the same if we did not open our mouths or were not here at all?

Mr. FOCHT. The fault is not ours. We did not call the extra session. You had to make your agreement with the White House that you would pass the "reciprocity" bill. We have nothing to do with that. You are surely responsible for printing the bill and other waste.

Mr. SIMS. Whose White House is it?

Mr. FOCHT. You claim that and everything else in sight.

Mr. SIMS. Who owns the White House?

Mr. FOCHT. You act as though you did; you act as though you really had the President now. I believe you have discounted Democratic success for 20 years ahead—or at least 16—but you are entirely mistaken.

The optimism of these Democrats reminds me of the man who jumped off the thirty-second story of the Singer Building in New York. When he got down to about the fifteenth floor he cried out, "I'm all right so far," but when he landed on the sidewalk there was not enough left of him to hold a postmortem upon, and so it will be with you when you hit the sidewalk in 1912. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. SIMS. Does the gentleman repudiate his own President and no longer lay any claim to him?

Mr. FOCHT. I may regard a man a great statesman, a great lawyer, thoroughly honest, with a great heart, a genius, and yet he may not be perfect, and this may be the moment that our President has made a mistake, and I believe he has. I believe as patriotic, as intelligent, as loyal Republicans as live on the face of the earth will sustain what I say here now in the next election when I run for Congress.

Mr. FINLEY. How about President Taft when he runs?

Mr. FOCHT. Just give you full swing and there will be no trouble about a Republican majority.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Does the gentleman think the people will sustain the President?

Mr. FOCHT. Gentlemen on that side need not flatter themselves that they were really sent for. It was only by reason of the fact that Republicans remained away from the polls that they were elected.

Mr. FINLEY. The gentleman has stated that he himself will be sustained in the next election.

Mr. FOCHT. Yes.

Mr. FINLEY. What is the opinion of the gentleman as to President Taft, when he runs for reelection?

Mr. FOCHT. Why, he will be elected, too. People will overlook a little mistake. In the main, he is all right. He is thoroughly honest, and we understand what he is doing; he is at least 99 per cent all right.

What the American people want to know is how much it is. They must see the bottom of things. As somebody stated about the graft in New York, that Tammany satisfied the reformers that it was only 5 per cent, and they said: "All right; we only want to know how much it is."

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Well, have they found out how much?

Mr. FOCHT. The gentleman is from New York, is he?

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. No; from New Jersey.

Mr. FOCHT. Well, you have a fine State; you issue charters for trusts there, but I understand you have been converted.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. I hope we will be able to convert Pennsylvania.

Mr. FOCHT. We are the representatives of the people. We gather to confer, discuss, exchange views, and to ultimately arrive at compromise conclusions. Therefore I see no reason why, if I have a thought with respect to the policy, the prudence, and the wisdom and the statesmanship of events looking to annexation of Canada, I should not state it.

Now, do not think that this is such a far call, this question of Canadian annexation. While I have descended from a race of preachers back in the days of the Reformation and might quote scripture, and also tell you why Canada did not become a part of this Republic originally, I will refrain from introducing religious matters here since your forefathers eliminated this subject from the Declaration of Independence and from the Constitution.

There are enough people ready and willing to come over any day, and that can be done without any contest. It will be purely a commercial conquest. The fusion and amalgamation and complete assimilation of the great Anglo-Saxon race, the real Teuton, who must dominate the world, I say here, whether President Taft believes it or whether he likes it, that ultimately that will happen. It could happen as well to-morrow as in a hundred years. The fusion would be complete and serenely accomplished without conflict. Mighty few changes would have to be wrought to have us one people. There is but one point to which I referred that would seriously interfere, and that is worthy of deep consideration.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOCHT. I will.

Mr. SHERLEY. Is not there one necessary prerequisite to the annexation of Canada, and that is desire?

Mr. FOCHT. Yes; and the desire is there.

Mr. SHERLEY. I spend from two to three months in Canada every year, and in the part that the gentleman speaks of. I have not found it so. Kipling voiced the Canadian sentiment when he said:

Daughter am I in my mother's house,
But mistress in my own.

Canada is feeling her sovereignty, and does not desire annexation.

Mr. FOCHT. No country has sovereignty that is obliged to send a treaty to a mother country for final ratification. The only country where real sovereignty resides with the people is the United States.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. FOCHT. Certainly.

Mr. SHERLEY. There has not been an instance in the gentleman's lifetime when a matter peculiar to Canada alone has not been settled by the will of Canada.

Mr. FOCHT. I do not see what that has to do with present momentous exigencies. I want to say that in visiting Toronto I had business with the president of a large trust company. He seemed like the high-class business men, as they all are in my State—like a bank president, or a high-class merchant, or a doctor, and I might include the lawyer. [Laughter.]

Mr. MURDOCK. And do not forget the newspaper profession. [Laughter.]

M. FOCHT. And, I will say, consistent newspaper editors—those who are for free print paper and against some other things. [Laughter.] I said, "My friend, you look like a good American, a Yankee; I do not see that you are particularly marked up with the union jack." He said, "No; I know what you mean, and that would have happened by this time had it not been that in the McKinley tariff bill you cut off our market for barley, and that incensed our people, and not only the people who raise the barley, but the great financial interests who had to help find a market and an outlet for that great product; and since then we have not warmed up very much on the question of annexation." But, Mr. Chairman, dismiss Canada. That is easy at any time.

If we want empire, however, my friends—and it looks very much as though we are very near the occupation of some other country; if we want empire, and we want to follow the lure of gold and the call of adventure—turn in another direction. You can see what is going on on the border in a land where there is no sovereignty, where the sovereignty resides in one man, and he is old and trembling and about ready to quit. With his passing from earth or earthly power the State also passes.

Now, what are we going to do if we are the policemen of the Western Hemisphere? That is the way to look at it, and our southern friends truly will not object. It will be much easier than in 1847. In fact, there will be no resistance whatever in that direction. I have a young man associated with me who just came from there, an officer of the Army, and he says they are going over and going over to stay, and we are going over to add one more little burden to the white man. From all indications the American soldier will soon stack arms on the plains of Mexico; and if he does not, it will be a close call. I would not think that the President would object. We have been absorbing everything not wanted in southern Europe for years and years, have we not? We have taken what nobody wanted in the Pacific seas—another white man's burden. We added a little more down there in the West Indies. Why could we not occupy something that is worth having and where we could be of some great good to humanity. [Laughter.] I am not a soldier of fortune. I do not expect to be at the head of the Army, but we are called upon to discuss occasionally paramount questions, and I believe this will be a mighty interesting one before Congress adjourns.

Now, to pass on, I do not want to take up too much time. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] gave me one-half hour, and since I have only 10 minutes left I do not like to be pressed too hard. There is a young man over there on the Democratic side, a very eloquent young man from Georgia, who made a speech yesterday, and he, like the President, could be mistaken in his conclusions. He would have this House believe that Alexander Hamilton was a free trader. He even referred to the report he made in 1791 as Secretary of the Treasury and by the direction of Congress, and never said a word about the construction of the tariff bill or the character of it that followed. Now, it would appear that my Democratic friends stand on political ancestry, and that calls to mind a story of a young man who wanted to get the genealogy of his family and join the four hundred. So he had a high-priced professor go to work and get it up. About the time he thought he had the documents in good shape he was advised that he was an adopted son. [Laughter.] And so it is with my Democratic friends when they quote Alexander Hamilton, Thomas Jefferson, and Andrew Jackson and James Buchanan and Grover Cleveland. They are talking about people who are not their political ancestors, for every one was a protectionist, and you can find confirmation of this in the Messages and Papers of the Presidents in any library.

Every utterance of these Presidents was for protection, and I dare say that one-fourth of the membership on that side of the House, men who come from the active industrial centers of the South, are also protectionists, or their constituents are. I want to say that every man from the North who sits on that side of the House has a constituency that are protectionists; and as for the rest of them, as soon as we send enough energy and capital to the South to arouse the slumbering forces of that great section the whole South will be for protection. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, my friends, we have discussed tariff for taxation, for revenue, for protection, but I do not know, not having been here during all of these discussions, what has been said in reference to a market for what we produce. After all, is that not most important? It must be conceded as the common-sense thing, as the result of every tariff law that looked toward lower duties, that we must have a measure of protection. I can not conceive that any intelligent man would undertake for a moment to go on record as saying that we must not at least have protection against the surplus product of Europe.

And believing that to be true, then every man is in some measure a protectionist. Now, if we protect our industries and regulate the irregularities inside, and after all, my friends, I will admit that Democrats—I do not need to admit that, but I admit that any farsighted, observant citizen——

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Do not admit they are farsighted; do not admit that.

Mr. FOCHT (continuing). Will say that in your attempted tariff revision, in the one instance it strikes at the farmer and in the other instance it strikes at the manufacturer and at the workingmen. You have stuck the wrong pig, you have stuck the thing that will destroy every vital commercial interest in this country; take away your revenues, take away the pension from the soldier because you have not revenue to pay it, of which we have had notice this morning, put out the fires of our factories, and drive men to idleness in the streets. Keep up this tariff properly regulated, and pursue diligently and relentlessly what the Republican Party has started to carry out—and that is the regulation of the great combinations of wealth and power at the bar of the court. And I will stop to say that at the other end of this Capitol are two great trusts standing ready, I believe, to be dissolved, and I hope that one after another may be brought there and properly regulated—not destroyed, not confiscated, but brought within reasonable bounds, so that there may be left some opportunity for individual enterprise and effort—and that they may operate within the law, that there may result a better distribution of the rewards and blessings of this great country and of its great resources. [Applause on the Republican side.]

In a conversation with the then Secretary of State, Mr. Root, coming from New York one day shortly after his return from a visit to South America, I made the observation that I hoped he had been successful in accomplishing some reciprocity treaties with those Republics, having in mind the fact that we did have a trade arrangement with southern Republics which gave us a good market for our products until the treaties were abrogated by our Democratic friends, when this market was largely lost. This comes directly home to me from the fact that a large flouring mill in my home town in Pennsylvania enjoyed an extensive South American trade under the reciprocal arrangement but lost it when the treaties were nullified. Then it naturally, logically follows that if we look for an opening for our products, if we maintain the Monroe doctrine there, if we are the policemen of the Western Hemisphere, let us seek it there; and I wanted to see what effort was being made on the part of the State Department to accomplish that result. The Secretary did not enter extensively into a discussion, being a State matter, but he did say that he hoped his visit would result in large commercial benefit to the American people.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FOCHT. I would like to have a few more minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] is not here.

Mr. FOCHT. I would like to have unanimous consent for a few minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to have his time extended.

Mr. MURDOCK. Until he concludes.

Mr. FOCHT. For five minutes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Well, for 5 minutes or 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. FOCHT. Following that, my friends, was the trip of an American armada that would have made that of King Philip of Spain look insignificant, along the coast of South America, around the Horn, over the Pacific, through the Mediterranean, and home. Now, you can imagine what the object of that was. I understand the South American Republics believed that we were not strong enough to support and sustain them in the maintenance of their national integrity in case they would withdraw their trade with European countries and we were admitted to their markets. When that fleet went around there they had evidence, but it seems there is something in the way, something does not work right, and while we have a most excellent Consular Service, excellent men in that service, and an increase in the appropriation, yet we have not been able to fully reach the market. The fact is, they might reach it if they take advantage of the machinery which the State Department places at their service, and to that subject I will for a moment address myself.

For a few minutes I wish to talk about a phase of American commerce which, I believe, is entitled to far more consideration than is any tariff, which at best is never altogether satisfactory, although the principle should by this time be better understood by my friends KITCHIN, of South Carolina, SIMS, of Tennessee, and HEFLIN, of Alabama. My Chairman, Mr. FINLEY, I suppose, is as badly informed as the rest, but until he goes on record I will not include him.

To my mind the most essential requisite for American prosperity is to keep our manufacturing establishments running at maximum capacity, and to do this is to first hold our own market for what we produce and find sale in foreign countries for our surplus.

The most important question is to reach the foreign consumer direct if this much-discussed surplus of American manufacturers is to be readily disposed of. Are the manufacturers of the country aware of the machinery that now exists enabling them to approach the foreign buyer direct? Are they aware of the great and valuable facilities that the Department of State and the Department of Commerce and Labor have provided? The general and insistent demand during the first half of the last decade from all sections of the country and from all classes of business concerns, from commercial bodies and the press generally, for a reorganization and the improvement in the Consular Service has resulted in bringing this branch of our Government up to a high state of efficiency. Are the manufacturers of the country aware of this efficiency? Are they making use of it?

This improvement has been attained at a considerable increase in appropriations. In 1900 the annual expense for the Consular Service was approximately $1,250,000; to-day it is $1,900,000; but the actual tangible results have more than warranted this increase. To-day, through our present efficient Consular Service, every possible market of the world for American products has been studied and reported upon. Any manufacturer may know not only the requirements of each commercial center of the world, but has published for him a carefully compiled directory of all the important business houses the world over, with information as to classes of goods each house is engaged in importing. This directory has been compiled by the Department of Commerce and Labor from reports and data furnished by the various American consuls.

In short, the organization and dissemination of commercial intelligence respecting foreign markets on practical and systematic lines for the benefit of the American manufacturer is a problem which has been fairly well worked out by the Department of State through the Consular Service, and the Department of Commerce and Labor through the Bureau of Manufactures. But it is evident that only a small portion of our manufacturers are aware of the great advantage and assistance that is available through these Government departments. The Daily Consular Reports are full of valuable information for all classes of our business houses. Information respecting foreign markets and business houses is therefore well provided for the American manufacturer, if he cares to avail himself of it.

And now the other essential service in developing our foreign trade is about to be provided. Through the plan now adopted of equipping each American consulate with card-index files every manufacturer of the country is permitted to have a brief of his catalogue prepared on cards for classifying and filing in card-index files, in the various commercial languages of the world, without any cost or fee other than the cost of printing or preparing his cards for these files. It is now up to the manufacturer seeking a foreign market to take advantage of these great privileges. This plan of providing full information respecting every line of goods produced in America in the language of the various countries in such shape that every foreign buyer may have this information not only at any American consulate, but such portion of it as his individual requirements demand, in his own office at the cost of postage in mailing it to him, is the completion of an almost perfect system in developing our foreign trade. The facilities are all at hand; it is now not only the privilege but duty of every manufacturer to use it to his utmost capacity, for in developing foreign commerce it is true, as in all other efforts, combined and persistent action is what tells.

Possibly not more than one manufacturer out of 10 throughout the United States knows that these various aids on the part of the Government exist. Just think of the result to our foreign trade if any foreign merchant in any part of the world can step into the nearest American consulate and consult a file in his own language that will give him full and accurate information respecting every line of goods manufactured or produced in the United States, and then have a duplicate of such portion as he may wish of these files placed in his own office for his constant use. Just think what a tremendous impetus this will give to our foreign commerce, and all this is possible if the press of the country will make this service known to each manufacturer, and then each manufacturer does his part in preparing the information in the required form for the consulates.

This work is undertaken by a private concern, for the reason that the special and individual service to each manufacturer and the distribution of this information to individual buyers is a work that is manifestly outside of the domain of a government office. This private organization is the Commercial Bureau Co., which has made an offer to the Department of State to equip all American consulates with a system of card-index files containing complete digests of the catalogues of all manufacturers of the United States without expense to the State Department and free to the manufacturers. The Department of State has therefore given the Commercial Bureau Co. the privilege of placing these files in each American consulate, providing no preference is shown and no fee charged to the manufacturers for the filing of these cards in the consulates. The department has no part in the service, and any manufacturer desiring to take advantage of the free service in the consulates must communicate direct with the Commercial Bureau Co., 50 Church Street, New York. But the broad policy of the Department of State in permitting a private organization to render this service to the consulates is to be commended. It is not only commendable from the standpoint of broad-minded statesmanship, but from a business point it is a great economy.

Much time and attention is now given by our consuls in transmitting inquiries to the department that can be answered instantly by these files, thus not only saving time, but a considerable expense in clerical hire and other expenses. The Government has done its part well; it is now the manufacturer who must do his part. The advantages of this publicity should be very great to all American manufacturers in all lines, and this arrangement should be studied with care by them.

It is evident from what has been said during the prolonged debate on this subject of trade with Canada, whether reciprocal or otherwise, or whether or not we are to have this proposed free list, the thing we want more than anything else, the thing that will keep our mills and factories busy and our workmen employed, is a market for our surplus products. The means of finding these markets is furnished by the Government; it is now up to the enterprise of our manufacturers to take advantage of the opportunity thus offered. [Loud applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DICKINSON].

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, the bill providing for a reciprocal trade agreement between the United States and Canada has passed this House. It has been charged by those opposing the reciprocity bill, that it was not fair to and that it discriminated against the great farming class, and particularly the farmers of the West. And it is true that there does exist among some of the farmers of the West a fear that injustice will be done them, unless some legislation is passed by this Congress manifestly in their interest. The charge has been boldly and aggressively made here by Members opposed to reciprocity, that the treaty agreement advocated by the President, and for the consideration of which Congress was called into extra session, would work an injury to the farming class, and therefore ought to be defeated as a matter of justice to that element; and this charge has been principally made by the high protectionist, who in all the years past has never heeded the prayer of the man upon the farm; and it has been further urged that it ought not to become a law, because the principle of protection was endangered or violated thereby. Regardless of these claims, the reciprocity bill passed the House by a very large vote of 267 votes for and 89 against—a majority of 178 votes. Many, however, voted for reciprocity who probably would not have been willing to so vote were it not for the fact that there was pending in the House what is known as the farmers' free-list bill—a companion measure to Canadian reciprocity—and reported at the same time, hoping by the passage thereof to remedy whatever harm, if any, there might be in the reciprocity bill; and now the opportunity is given to those who voted for and those who voted against reciprocity to help pass this free-list bill.

A majority of the Republicans voted against the reciprocity bill, alleging it was a stroke at the principle of protection—a breach in the wall of protection, if it should become a law—and that the President in proposing it was espousing a Democratic proposition. I take it that a large percentage of them will vote against this free-list bill for the same reason; but those who based their objection upon injustice done the farmer can now, at least, help the situation by voting for this bill, which seeks to do substantial justice to the farming class.

I ask to insert here the free-list bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4413) to place on the free list agricultural implements, cotton bagging, cotton ties, leather, boots and shoes, fence wire, meats, cereals, flour, bread, timber, lumber, sewing machines, salt, and other articles.

Be it enacted, etc., That on and after the day following the passage of this act the following articles shall be exempt from duty when imported into the United States:

Plows, tooth and disk harrows, headers, harvesters, reapers, agricultural drills and planters, mowers, horserakes, cultivators, threshing machines and cotton gins, farm wagons and farm carts, and all other agricultural implements of any kind and description, whether specifically mentioned herein or not, whether in whole or in parts, including repair parts.

Bagging for cotton, gunny cloth, and all similar fabrics, materials, or coverings, suitable for covering and baling cotton, composed in whole or in part of jute, jute butts, hemp, flax, sea, Russian sea, New Zealand tow, Norwegian tow, aloe, mill waste, cotton tares, or any other materials or fibers suitable for covering cotton; and burlaps and bags or sacks composed wholly or in part of jute or burlaps or other material suitable for bagging or sacking agricultural products.

Hoop or band iron, or hoop or band steel, cut to lengths, punched or not punched, or wholly or partly manufactured into hoops or ties, coated or not coated with paint or any other preparation, with or without buckles or fastenings, for baling cotton or any other commodity; and wire for baling hay, straw, and other agricultural products.

Grain, buff, split, rough and sole leather, band, bend, or belting leather, boots and shoes made wholly or in chief value of leather made from cattle hides and cattle skins of whatever weight, of cattle of the bovine species, including calfskins; and harness, saddles, and saddlery, in sets or in parts, finished or unfinished, composed wholly or in chief value of leather; and leather cut into shoe uppers or vamps or other forms suitable for conversion into manufactured articles.

Barbed fence wire, wire rods, wire strands or wire rope, wire woven or manufactured for wire fencing, and other kinds of wire suitable for fencing, including wire staples.

Beef, veal, mutton, lamb, pork, and meats of all kinds, fresh, salted, pickled, dried, smoked, dressed or undressed, prepared or preserved in any manner; bacon, hams, shoulders, lard, lard compounds and lard substitutes; and sausage and sausage meats.

Buckwheat flour, corn meal, wheat flour and semolina, rye flour, bran, middlings, and other offals of grain, oatmeal and rolled oats, and all prepared cereal foods; and biscuits, bread, wafers, and similar articles not sweetened.

Timber, hewn, sided, or squared, round timber used for spars or in building wharves, shingles, laths, fencing posts, sawed boards, planks, deals, and other lumber, rough or dressed, except boards, planks, deals, and other lumber, of lignum-vitæ, lancewood, ebony, box, granadilla, mahogany, rosewood, satinwood, and all other cabinet woods.

Sewing machines, and all parts thereof.

Salt, whether in bulk or in bags, sacks, barrels, or other packages.

I hope the bill will pass this House and become a law as a matter of simple justice to this class who ask only for fair treatment, a square deal, equal and exact justice to all, and special privileges to none. The farmers of the Central West feel that if reciprocity with Canada passes Congress, causing free trade in farm products between the United States and Canada, that a free-list bill should also be passed, putting upon the free list the products of manufacture used by the farmers in the raising of food products to be used by all the people.

Many feel that it is wrong to let in farm products free, unless manufactured goods and implements used by the farmers should also be free of duty. They do not ask for protection, only fair treatment, and they demand that you put on the free list the manufactured articles they daily purchase and use in the production of these food products. They know that legislation heretofore has not been in their interest. They remember that hides were put on the free list under the promise that cheaper shoes and leather goods would result, and they now point to the fact that shoes, harness, and leather products sell higher; and they urge that, since hides are free of tariff, the tariff be likewise taken off of leather products. They will not be satisfied unless this or a similar free list be passed. It may be that this free-list bill should be amended before final passage.

Many wanted the reciprocity bill amended in the House and now hope that it may be amended before it finally becomes a law by adding the free-list bill to the reciprocity bill. But in any event it is hoped that the free-list bill will be passed as a simple act of justice to that great class to which this Nation owes its support and existence. You can not get along without the farmer. You can not afford to have him dissatisfied. You have been friendly all these years to the manufacturer; never to the farmer. The farmer is more alert and restless to-day than ever before. He has grown tired of the high protective tariff walls. You will have to reckon with him in the future. If the relief asked for in this bill is withheld, if remedial legislation asked for by him is not provided by this Congress, either at this extra session or in the coming regular session, the responsibility will be upon the Republican Party for such failure. It will not be the fault of this Democratic House. At the other end of the Capitol sits a Republican Senate, and in the White House a Republican President.

The farmer wants cheaper agricultural implements, cheaper shoes and harness, cheaper wire fencing. He wants cheaper lumber, and better clothing at reasonable and honest prices. He wants cheaper sugar. These demands must be met by Congress. Old conditions will not longer be tolerated. The time will come, and is near at hand, when both branches of this National Congress will respond to the wishes and demands of the producing and consuming classes.

Direct election of Senators is a reform measure pressed to the front by the masses, not for its own sake, but in order that laws may be enacted in the interest of all the people. An income tax will in the near future become a part of the law of the land, under and by virtue of which a hundred million dollars can reasonably be collected annually from incomes of those possessed of great wealth, to help bear the burdens of the Government, and then there will be no excuse for high protective laws.

This House has made progress, responsive to the progressive thought of the masses of the people, having passed a joint resolution providing for the election of Senators by direct vote of the people of the States; having passed a bill providing for publicity of campaign expenses and contributions before election, so that Federal elections can not secretly be controlled by the undue use of money contributed by great corporate interests for selfish purposes; having also passed the reciprocity bill and the apportionment bill. All of these bills have been sent to the Senate, and there is now about ready to pass this free-list bill, a companion bill to the reciprocity bill.

I voted for reciprocity, with an almost unanimous Democracy, and I believe it will redound to the mutual benefit of both countries if it should pass and become a law. I do not believe that any harm will be done to the great State which I have the honor in part to represent, nor any substantial injury to any part of our Republic.

The entire delegation of my State voted for reciprocity, and every Democrat from Missouri will vote for the free-list bill. The right of repeal is reserved in the treaty, and if experience should prove that its enactment is injurious to American interests, a future Congress can and will repeal it. The bill has been fully discussed from every viewpoint and the probable effect it would have upon farm products in every section

Now, while the treaty might have been amended by the House and thereby better satisfied the views of many, yet it would have been charged that the amendment was put on the bill in the House for political purposes; and the Democratic Party, acting with substantial unanimity, decided to pass the bills through the House separately, and has sent the reciprocity bill to the Senate, where it can be amended by adding the free list or both may be passed as separate measures.

Expressing my personal views, and, I believe, the sentiment of many of my colleagues, I can not refrain from saying that I hope the bill will be amended in the Senate, or, rather, that the two bills will be combined by adding a new section to the reciprocity bill that will include the free-list bill, unless assured that this free-list bill shall pass and become a law, in which event it may be immaterial whether it becomes a law by attaching it to the reciprocity bill or by a separate bill.

The amendment of the reciprocity bill, by adding another section embodying the free-list bill, can be done without affecting the treaty with Canada.

In a recent speech made by President Taft in New York, and which speech is printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 29 as a part of the remarks of the Representative from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN], the President says:

> Of course a mere reduction of our tariff or the putting of any article on the free list, without insisting on a corresponding change in the Canadian tariff, will not interfere with the contract as made with Canada.

The amendment of the bill by attaching the free list thereto will not invalidate the treaty nor interfere with ratification of the reciprocal agreement by the Canadian Parliament. It will simply require the President to approve the free-list bill at the same time he attaches his signature to the treaty, and he will be stronger thereby with the people of the West and the farmers and consumers everywhere by approving the free-list bill as an amendment or as a separate bill and immeasurably weaker before the American people if he defeats the free-list bill by the exercise of his veto power. And he can well afford to meet the wishes of the Democratic Party, that advocates this free-list bill, and thereby acknowledge his indebtedness to that party for the passage of the reciprocity bill, without whose aid it would have utterly failed.

If the free-list bill be attached to the treaty, it will operate as a free-list bill for all the world, but would not invalidate the reciprocity agreement. And who will be harmed thereby? The manufacturers are already selling their articles in foreign markets in competition with all the world; the putting of them upon the free list will simply prevent the manufacturer from longer extorting from the consumers of our country higher prices than he secures abroad. And why should the President object if the people of the United States desire this legislation and should insist on procuring it at the same time he procures reciprocity with Canada? Why not have both by act of the same Congress? By attaching the free list to the reciprocity agreement it will insure the enactment of the free-list measure at the same time he signs the Canadian agreement. Give the President what he asks and let him at the same time give the American consumer what he demands.

However, I do not entertain any fear of harm resulting from closer and freer trade relations with a friendly neighboring people. The trade balance is now, and always has been, in our favor, and I know of no good reason why the trade balance should not continue in our favor.

I quote from a carefully prepared statement, which I will insert as a part of my remarks.

During the last five years ending June 30 last, in goods of all kinds—

We sold in Canada	$886,417,376
Canada sold to us	393,913,673
Difference in our favor	492,503,703

These figures show that Canada is a good country for us to trade with. Any country which buys more from us than it sells to us is a good country to trade with. No tariff wall should stand between us and such a country.

Horses:
We sold in Canada	$14,172,075
Canada sold to us	2,549,201
Difference in our favor	11,622,874
Cattle:
We sold in Canada	1,578,179
Canada sold to us	1,193,796
Difference in our favor	384,383
Meat and dairy products:
We sold in Canada	17,011,017
Canada sold to us	904,191
Difference in our favor	16,106,826
Breadstuffs:
We sold in Canada	31,596,556
Canada sold to us	6,679,884
Difference in our favor	24,916,672
Corn:
We sold in Canada	21,704,572
Canada sold to us	14,350
Difference in our favor	21,690,222
Wheat:
We sold in Canada	4,442,307
Canada sold to us	766,254
Difference in our favor	3,676,053

Canada needs our products and must buy from us, and we need her lumber and forest products. She can not produce corn sufficient for her wants. Canada in 1910 raised about 25,000,000 bushels of corn, while the United States raised over 3,000,000,000 bushels in the same year—more than 100 bushels to 1. Canada has a population of less than 8,000,000, the United States about 92,000,000—3 bushels of corn for each inhabitant in Canada, while the United States has about 32 bushels for each inhabitant—and the Canadian yield is principally in Ontario, no corn of moment being raised in western Canada. Where corn is raised hogs and cattle are fattened. As to wheat, we raise a surplus, so does Canada, and the surplus of both countries is shipped abroad, where the price is fixed, based upon the surplus and production of all the world. What would be the effect of taking the tariff off of wheat?

The present tariff on wheat is 25 cents a bushel, but is really one-fourth of 1 cent a bushel when purchased to be ground into flour for export. Under the present law the American miller pays a duty of 25 cents a bushel on every bushel of wheat imported from Canada, but when he grinds it into flour for export trade he draws back 99 per cent of the 25 cents on each bushel, leaving one-quarter of 1 cent a bushel tariff on Canadian wheat.

It is true that if imported into the United States to be ground into flour and sold here, the importer must pay 25 cents a bushel, a prohibitive tariff, and none is imported, I am informed, except for seed or to be ground into flour for export trade. Nor is there any demand for it, for we have a surplus of wheat grown in the United States, which alike is exported and sold abroad to help meet the demand for wheat and flour in the world's markets. Of what benefit to the farmer is the present tariff on wheat? Why not take off the tariff on both wheat under the reciprocity agreement and flour under the free-list bill?

A great farm journal, edited in Des Moines, Iowa, and known as Wallaces' Farmer, recently, in an editorial on reciprocity in farm products, said:

When we come to look at the matter from the farmers' standpoint, divested of prejudice, it is pretty hard to see how this treaty can seriously affect the farmers of the corn belt one way or the other. There is no possibility of any competition in growing corn. Only in Ontario is there any chance of growing any amount of corn, and this will cost far more than it does in the corn belt, as much as it does in the New England States contiguous to the Canadian line. The great production in Canada is wheat. The reciprocity treaty can not affect us at all so long as we have a surplus of wheat to send abroad. It is quite as cheap to send it from Canada to Liverpool as from the wheat fields of the Northwest. Under these conditions the prices for both countries are fixed in Liverpool.

The same journal further states:

We anticipate that our readers, who are bitterly opposed to this treaty, will not be hurt half as bad as they expect.

And further says:

Probably if this treaty could have been ratified by the President, without saying anything about it and nothing had been published in the papers about it, they would not have noticed any change.

In another issue of this same farm journal it says:

The reciprocity treaty with Canada will not, in our judgment, seriously lower the prices of farm products in the West.

In a recent issue of the Commoner, a paper owned by William J. Bryan, three times nominated for President by the Democratic Party, and published at Lincoln, Nebr., the following statement is made:

The Democrats in Congress do well when they begin tariff revision by putting upon the free list something like 100 articles largely consumed by farmers. The farmer has been the chief sufferer from the principle of protection, and it is only fair that relief should begin with him. The reciprocity treaty is a godsend to him, not so much because it confers great benefits upon him, but because it leads to greater reductions. The opponents of the reciprocity agreement have tried to hide behind the farmer, but the farmers' free list will drive them from under cover and compel them to vote with the Democrats or quit talking about the farmer.

I submit to this body these recent utterances of this great agricultural journal, and of the Commoner, both published in the Central West, regarding the probable effects of this treaty, as against the utterances of those here and elsewhere who seek to play upon the fears of the farmers in their eager desire to defeat these measures and thereby perpetuate the control of those interests that speculate in the great necessities of life. This same agricultural journal calls upon Congress to "remove the iniquities from the wool and cotton fabrics" and other manufactured products, and these things this Congress will attempt to remedy by reducing the tariffs to a revenue basis. The attempt will be fought by the high protectionist, the same influence seeking at the same time to defeat both reciprocity and the free-list bill.

The high-protection Republican Congressman assumes a peculiar rôle. He pleads for the farmer in opposing reciprocity and pleads for the manufacturer in opposing the free-list bill. Half of them seek to sustain the President in his advocacy of a reciprocity agreement and the other half violently or sorrowfully criticize him and denounce reciprocity as a fake treaty.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], the very high priest of protection, while opposing at the last session the reciprocity treaty, when the Republicans were in the majority, but divided as now on the treaty, offered a free-list bill as an amendment to the McCall reciprocity bill, and at this session he actively opposes the free-list bill presented by the Democrats. Does he not play politics with a vengeance, when he proposes a free-list bill as an amendment to reciprocity in the short session last winter, and now opposes the same measure offered by Democrats at this extra session?

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] voted against reciprocity and spoke against the free list, and complained because the free list was not put on as an amendment to the reciprocity bill. Is it possible that, having opposed both bills separately, he feels aggrieved because he is deprived of the opportunity of voting against both at the same time? Anticipating an attack upon what is known as schedule K, the woolen schedule, denounced even by President Taft as indefensible, the high protectionists are sending to Representatives here a scarecrow picture of Congress personified as a man with a sword dagger in his hand, thrust through schedule K, and back of it through American labor and the American sheep raiser, warning Congress to "look beyond before you thrust." This same picture is doubtless being sent to the western farmer and sheep raiser.

These great tariff beneficiaries would play upon the fears of the farmer to-day and the laborer to-morrow, and rob both every day in the year, and sell them shoddy and cheap clothing at robber prices in order that high protection may continue to extort and enjoy excessive profits upon inferior clothing. The American farmer and laborer wants only fair treatment, but he demands the right and opportunity to buy better clothing at reasonable prices. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

So come also the manufacturers of shoes and other leather products and protest against that part of this free-list bill affecting shoes, harness, and other leather products—the same people who came two years ago to Congress asking for free hides, so they could sell better and cheaper shoes. Taking the tariff off the finished product may help to destroy the monopoly that extorts undue profits from the American consumer.

The Lumber Trust wants both reciprocity and the free-list bill defeated, but the American people are demanding free lumber so they can build homes with lumber bought at reasonable prices. On the Canadian side are almost inexhaustible forests to which our people should have access. Our forests have been in a large measure destroyed or are in the control of comparatively few owners, whose powerful hands hold the lumber supply in their grasp, and cupidity fixes the price consumers must pay. We need Canadian lumber. Free lumber we ought to have in exchange for our surplus products.

I have listened with interest to the speeches of distinguished Republicans who denounce both the reciprocity and the free-list bills. These Republicans representing agricultural districts have been telling their Republican farmer constituents about the protection given by the Republican Party to products grown on the farm, and have been calling upon them to remain loyal to the great friend of the farmer—the Republican Party. The Democrats have been saying to them that these tariffs on the products of the farm were mere paper tariffs, a delusion and a snare, and now comes the Republican President and tears the mask aside and reveals the nakedness of the professions of the Republican Party, and says in substance that these farmer tariffs are but a cloak for the speculator in farm products. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The reciprocity agreement fathered by the President angers the Republican Representative who now sees the dilemma in which he is placed, and he denounces the treaty as a fake agreement and would defeat both reciprocity and the free-list bill. When both become the law what will become of the Republican Representative who stands neither with the President nor with the farmer?

The farmer is beginning to see that their tariffs are mere paper tariffs and not real tariffs for protection. The Republican farmer who has been standing for protection is helping to bring about a reduction of the tariff, and when these paper tariffs are taken off the products he raises he will see what a sham and fraud has been perpetrated upon him all these years; or, if he feels that these tariffs were a real protection, he will want a square deal and equal treatment by reducing or taking the tariff off of the things he has to buy. And then the farmer, as never before, will become the greatest advocate in all the land for lower tariffs and freer trade and will help strike down high protection, under the shadow of whose walls trusts and monopolies have flourished and fattened at the expense of the toiling and producing masses of the American people.

Do you wonder that these Republican Representatives are maddened at their own President? Do you wonder that they see the handwriting on the wall when, with a divided party, they see before them a united and triumphant Democracy marching in complete harmony to certain victory in the early future? [Loud applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. THAYER].

Mr. THAYER. Mr. Chairman, I shall not allude to the size nor the intelligence of this audience. The one is apparent and, I trust, the other will become as evident as I proceed with my discourse. I do not speak, however, merely for the information of this House, but for that far wider audience which reads the daily newspapers and occasionally dips into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Before commencing upon the subject matter of my talk I wish to say a few words to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT], who preceded me. He says that a great many of his Democratic friends hold their seats in this House on account of the abstention of the Republican voters. That may be true of some, but for my district I will say that the vote cast in this last election was over 1,000 larger than that cast in 1908, and that is true of all the vote in Massachusetts. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The gentleman from Pennsylvania also alluded to the expense which we would incur in this extra session. Now, the Democrats are not responsible one whit for this extra session, but it was the contumacy of the other branch of the Republican Legislature, the Senate, that caused it. But for my part I welcome this session, and I say that the slight expense to which we are putting the Government of the United States is well repaid by the relief which this House, at least, will offer to the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Yesterday the House listened to the able and eloquent speech of my colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS], a colleague whose district is adjacent to my own and whose district was enriched in redistricting in 1900 by several safe Democratic towns from the third congressional district, my own, trusting in the assured Republican strength of his and in the weakness which would come to the third district; but the Democratic incumbent at that time was successful in retaining the seat for the Democracy for the two terms which he occupied. He then voluntarily retired, and in this last election the calculations of the Republicans were again upset and the third district became again Democratic. Surely the Lord tempereth the votes to the shorn district. But I bespeak from my Republican colleague in this redistricting, which happened on account of the Massachusetts Congressmen being increased from 14 to 16, a redistricting which I opposed—I bespeak from him the return of my Democratic ewe lambs and I trust he will not give me back some of those deserted shoe villages with which his county, as well as my own, is so much encumbered. I would ask his reasons for the decadence of these shoe towns, if it is due to the high tariff which has been put upon their products.

In his discussion of the altruistic business methods of the United States Shoe Machinery Co., I asked him if he had in mind the act which was passed by the Massachusetts Legislature in 1907 forbidding a clause of their lease which restricted the lessees from buying or leasing any other machinery from any other vendors or lessors except the said company, and he said he had that in mind, but when I asked him to have that act read from the Clerk's desk he said he could not take up his time to do that. I will ask the indulgence of the House, in the performance of my public duty, to have read this act of 1907 and the supplementary act of 1908 against monopoly. I will ask that the Clerk read act 469 of 1907.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the act in the gentleman's time.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., as follows:

"SECTION 1. No person, firm, corporation, or association shall insert in or make it a condition or provision of any sale or lease of any tool, implement, appliance, or machinery that the purchaser or lessee thereof shall not buy, lease, or use machinery, tools, implements, or appliances or material or merchandise of any person, firm, corporation, or association other than such vendor or lessor; but this provision shall not impair the right, if any, of the vendor or lessor of any tool, implement, appliance, or machinery protected by a lawful patent right vested in such vendor or lessor to require, by virtue of such patent right, the vendee or lessee to purchase or lease from such vendor or lessor such component and constituent parts of said tool, implement, appliance, or machinery as the vendee or lessee may thereafter require during the continuance of such patent right: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to prohibit the appointment of agents or sole agents to sell or lease machinery, tools, implements, or appliances.

"SEC. 2. Any person, firm, corporation, or association, or the agent of any such person, firm, corporation, or association, that violates the provisions of this act shall be punished for each offense by a fine not exceeding $5,000.

"All leases, sales, or agreements therefor hereafter made in violation of any of the provisions of this act shall be void as to any and all of the terms or conditions thereof in violation of said provisions."

An act relative to monopolies and discriminations in the sale of articles or commodities in common use.

Be it enacted, etc., as follows:

SECTION 1. Every contract, agreement, arrangement, or combination in violation of common law in that whereby a monopoly in the manufacture, production, or sale in this Commonwealth of any article or commodity in common use is or may be created, established, or maintained, or in that thereby competition in this State in the supply or price of any such article or commodity is or may be restrained or prevented, or in that thereby, for the purpose of creating, establishing, or maintaining a monopoly within this State of the manufacture, production, or sale of any such article or commodity, the free pursuit in this State of any lawful business, trade, or occupation is or may be restrained or prevented is hereby declared to be against public policy, illegal, and void.

SEC. 2. The attorney general, or, by his direction, a district attorney, may bring an action in the name of the Commonwealth against any person, trustee, director, manager, or other officer or agent of a corporation, or against a corporation, to restrain the doing in his Commonwealth of any act herein forbidden or declared to be illegal, or any act in, toward, or for the making or consummation of any contract, agreement, arrangement, or combination herein prohibited, wherever the same may have been made. The superior court shall have jurisdiction to restrain and enjoin any act herein forbidden or declared to be illegal.

SEC. 3. In such action no person shall be excused from answering any questions that may be put to him, or from producing any books, papers, or documents, on the ground that the testimony or evidence, documentary or otherwise, required of him may tend to incriminate him, but no person shall be prosecuted in any criminal action or proceedings, or subjected to any penalty or forfeiture for or on account of any transaction, matter or thing concerning which he may justify, or produce evidence, documentary or otherwise, in any such action.

SEC. 4. Nothing in section 1 of this act shall be construed as impairing, repealing, or superseding any statute of this Commonwealth.

Approved April 28, 1908.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. THAYER. Mr. Chairman, I would ask for 10 minutes longer.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I can only yield the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. THAYER. I do not know that that will be sufficient, but I will make it do. The discussion of this farmers' free-list bill has already been worn almost to attenuation, but this phase has not been extensively dwelt upon. The gentleman from Indiana has already referred to the fact that at the time my colleague was defending this trust at the Senate end of the Capitol its methods were being pitilessly disclosed. "Thus the whirligig of time brings about its revenges," but not often so quickly. It is more like that incident in the New Testament where, while one disputant was protesting against the facts the feet of those who had borne out the other protestant were already at the door, and in this matter I refer not to the protagonist but to the principal. The conditions of shoe manufacturing in Massachusetts had become so scandalous that in 1907 a movement was started to restrain the abuses which the United States Shoe Machinery Co. has injected into its methods. There were long and acrimonious hearings at the statehouse, in which the most eminent and expensive counsel took part.

The proponents of this act were represented by Hon. Herbert Parker, a former Republican attorney general of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. Instead of business men of small means having the opportunity to engage in business with leased machinery, the United States Shoe Machinery Co. was but the controlling power in a long line of manufacturers compelling tribute of a greater part of the profits, and owning the body, soul, and brain of the hapless men who have been entangled in its net, a slavery as absolute as that of the Incas of Peru. These acts were passed, after a hard struggle, as a measure of relief to the manufacturers, but subsequent events have shown their futility. Recently an opponent named Plant attempted to start an independent organization and began operations on a great scale and with every prospect of success, but suddenly, almost before the promise of relief had been presented to the manufacturers, the Plant system was absorbed by the United States Shoe Machinery Co. It transpired that in order to finance his factory Mr. Plant had been obliged to borrow largely from the banks which had indeed solicited his custom, but in some mysterious way all of Plant's notes had found their way into the possession of the United States Shoe Machinery Co., and suddenly he was met by the demands for their payment.

There was no option but that which the United States Shoe Machinery Co. offered, and this independent organization was absorbed by the monopoly. This is instructive in itself as showing for what purposes the accumulated deposits of the common people are used, like the pinions of the eagle, to their own destruction. It is unnecessary to ask "upon what meat does this our Cæsar feed that he has grown so great?" There has been competent testimony that a machine which the United States Shoe Machinery Co. leases for $1,200 a year it sells outright to foreign purchasers for $400—a difference of $1,600 computed on a 6 per cent basis, of $2,000 computed on a 5 per cent basis, and $2,600 computed on a 4 per cent basis. And then we are asked not to remove the duty from the product because, perforce, the foreign manufacturer is using American machinery and will undersell our own manufacturers. If there are more elevated heights of impudence it remains for some Peary to discover them or some Cook to assume to. As to the reliefs we are entitled to, there are several. First, the removal of all duties from all products of monopoly, whether machinery or product. Second, the invocation of the United States law. I am inclined to agree with Senator Bailey and the United States Supreme Court, as enunciated in Continental Wall Paper Co. against Lewis Voight & Sons Co. (148 Fed. Rep., 939, 950), as pertinent.

> The consumer, at last, is the only real victim. It is the consumer who makes up the public, which it is the object of the law to protect against undue exaction through illegal combinations in restraint of freedom of commerce and fair play in commercial transactions.

It ill becomes monopolies like the United States Shoe Machinery Co., which is throttling independent manufacturers and become the arbitrary head of a great part of the shoe business, to cry out that we are destroying an American industry when we are reducing the cost of living to that class which works the hardest and receives the least reward for its labor. Conditions will not be bettered until we not only meet their challenge but remove, as above stated, the duties on their products, which are only an extortion on the American people, but further refuse admission to interstate commerce of all products of monopolies of whatever kind or nature.

> He that withholdeth corn—

And by corn I opine Solomon meant not only all cereals but all the necessities of life—> the people shall curse him, but blessings shall be upon the head of him that selleth it.

[Applause.]

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL].

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, as I look around this Hall I am very forcibly reminded of what I think will be the appearance of many an American workshop after the Democratic program is carried out. [Applause on the Republican side.]

There are more people in the galleries than on the floor, and, if I am not much mistaken, if this policy is carried to its legitimate conclusion there will be more American workmen on the streets than in the shops by and by. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Before taking up the bill I want to refer to one other subject, for I shall try to talk about the bill directly and see if I can get an idea from the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee as to what it means. When the present Speaker of this House delivered a most magnificent oration at the closing vote on the Payne tariff bill, after it came back from the Senate with the report of the conference committee, he said that the ad valorem average of all the schedules indicated that it was 1.71 per cent higher than the Dingley law. The newspaper press and the magazines of the country that desired to do harm to the Republican Party accepted that statement and have persisted in it ever since.

I did not believe that it was correct. I did not believe that it was possible to figure the ad valorem on a bill which had not gone into operation, and I asked of Treasury officials that a fair comparison between the two measures should be officially made. Six months after the law went into effect we knew the actual amount of money which had been paid into the Treasury as revenue under the Payne tariff bill, and I asked that those same identical importations, the same values, coming in at the same time, might be refigured on the basis of the Dingley tariff law, and it was done. At the State convention in Connecticut in September, 1910, I gave it authoritatively to my people, showing each schedule, exactly what had been received under the Payne law and what would have been received under the Dingley tariff rates. There could be no mistake in regard to it if the figuring of the Treasury Department was correct. I will not repeat the ad valorems of the various schedules. I will give them to anybody who desires them. The general average showed that there was received by the United States Treasury, and actually paid in, 6.4 per cent less money than would have been paid in if the invoices had all been refigured and reliquidated under the Dingley tariff law. That was made public. I sent it to the press of the country. I sent it, I think, to every Senator and Representative of the Sixty-first Congress, and there has been no excuse for the continued repetition of the statement that the last revision was upward instead of downward.

When the campaign of last fall began the very first thing that I met was the statement made by the Speaker. Now, I do not criticise him for making it. I will show you how it could have been honestly made and yet be an actual mistake.

Let me take an item in any of the schedules. Take the silk schedule, if you please, reading like this:

> Valued at not less than $1 a yard and not exceeding $2 a yard, $1.

Now, if the importation happens to be at $2 a yard, your ad valorem is 50 per cent; if it is $1.50 a yard, your ad valorem is 66⅔ per cent; if it is $1 a yard, your ad valorem is 100 per cent. So you can not make an estimate or a comparison between two tariff laws unless you figure the identical importation in both cases, and, of course, at the same value in both cases. And yet this erroneous statement is still being made, in utter disregard of the actual facts.

It went on all through the winter and in the discussion of the reciprocity bill during this session. Now I want to read a statement made the other day—innocently, of course—by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER]. He said:

> And when the bill prepared by the Ways and Means Committee of the Sixty-first Congress passed the Republican House it not only did not reduce the taxes, it not only failed to put the items in my bill on the free list, but it increased the taxes from about 45 to about 50 per cent. Hence I repeat again that when the people asked you for bread you gave them a stone.

And these are the kind of assertions faced by Republicans not only here in Congress but during the campaign last fall. I stated in the reciprocity debate that, in my judgment, the result of the election last fall was reached upon a series of mistakes which would in time develop themselves.

But I did not look for the development to come quite so quickly. It is here. A week ago last Saturday as I started for home I put in my pocket a copy of the report of the Ways and Means Committee upon this bill, the so-called farmers' free list. I read it on the cars going home—read it casually. Coming back I had nothing to occupy my time from New York to Washington, and again I casually picked the report out of my pocket and I have it here now. In that report, made by the Committee on Ways and Means officially, they contradict every statement that they have made in this campaign from the beginning to the end and contradict their own report. I ask the Republican Members of the House and such Democratic Members of the House as choose to gratify their curiosity—those who have the report—to take it in their hands for just a moment while I call attention to it.

On page 3 of the report is this language. I do not know who wrote it; I do not care:

REPUDIATED PROMISE OF DOWNWARD REVISION.

In its platform of 1908 the Republican Party announced the modification of its protection theory referred to by the President, and in deference to aroused public opinion against burdens imposed by the Dingley tariff of 1897, promised a downward revision of the tariff. On this promise the party secured from the people a further continuation of power. How this promise was repudiated in the enactment of the higher tariff act of 1909, and how the people, so far as their power extended at the time, in just resentment have driven the Republican Party from control in Congress are matters of history.

I now ask those who have a copy of this report with them to turn to page 11 of the same document. As I read this, getting along down toward Baltimore, my eyes were opened. I now call your attention to Table No. 4 in the Democratic majority report on this bill. The first thing I did when I came to Washington Tuesday morning—arriving at about midnight Monday night—was to try and find the author of these tables. I went to the Treasury Department, and the officials there repudiated them. I sent to the Statistical Bureau of the State Department, and they repudiated them. I sent to the Bureau of Statistics of the Treasury Department, and they repudiated them. I finally found him, located just exactly where I should have expected him to be, in the room of the Ways and Means Committee. He acknowledged the authenticity of this table that I am going to read to you to show whether the Payne tariff bill is lower or higher than the Dingley law, whether the Republican Party did comply with its promises, if it made any, and whether the Democratic committee has not absolutely repudiated their own statements in the identical report in which they made them. Let me read it to you:

[1] Not separately reported.

Take the first item. The table is headed "Value of imports entered for consumption, duties and ad valorem rates of duty, with relation to articles carried by the bill H. R. 4413"—that is the bill we have under consideration, Mr. Chairman, and it takes up each schedule; I am going to take them up—"for the years ending June 30, 1905 and 1910"; 1905 was under the Dingley law and 1910 is under the Payne law. Take the first item—agricultural implements. Under the Dingley law the duty was 20 per cent, according to the Democratic authority, and it is right. Under the Payne law it is 15.31 per cent, the difference being 4.69 per cent ad valorem in favor of the Payne bill.

Take cotton bagging—the next item—sacks, burlaps, and so forth. The duty under the Dingley law was 28.76, by Democratic authority. Under the Payne law it is 26.86, making a difference of 1.90 in favor of the Payne bill.

Cotton ties, under the Dingley law, were 36.10 by Democratic authority. Under the Payne bill they are 15.96, the difference being 20.14 in favor of the Payne bill.

Leather, boots, shoes, harness, saddles, saddlery, and so forth, under the Dingley law, were 33.42. Under the Payne bill they are 7.38, the reduction being 26.04 under the Payne bill according to Democratic authority, and that is right.

Barbed wire and other fence wire, 28.22 under the Dingley law, 28.18 under the Payne law, a reduction of 0.04 of 1 per cent.

Fresh and preserved meats—I am taking every one of these schedules in this pending bill and giving you Democratic authority for it—fresh and preserved meats, 23.96 under the Dingley law; 21.71 under the Payne bill—a difference in favor of the Payne bill of 2.25.

Flour, cereals, and bread. Last fall I said in that very speech which I sent out to you, every one of you, that the agricultural schedule was raised under the Payne bill, being one of the four or five that were raised. I find the same thing stated under Democratic authority now; for in this schedule, flour, cereals, and bread, the percentage was 21.28 under the Dingley law and 22.76 under the Payne bill, or 1.48 higher under the Payne bill.

Lumber, laths, and shingles, 13.33 under the Dingley law, 8.57 under the Payne bill, or 4.76 in favor of the Payne bill.

"Sewing machines, and parts of," 45 per cent under the Dingley law, 30 per cent under the Payne bill, or 15 per cent in favor of the Payne bill.

Salt, 51.25 under the Dingley law, 50.96 under the Payne bill, or 0.29 in favor of the Payne bill.

So that every item but one in this bill which you are now putting forward as a reduction has had a previous reduction, and, figuring it all up, you will find that instead of 6.40, as I said six months ago and published to you, you now officially report the average reduction of the Payne bill at 6.38, within 0.02 of 1 per cent, or in almost exact accordance with the facts that you had placed before you a year ago; and yet you continue to repeat these statements and send them out to the people and to the press and the magazines of this country, and continue to discuss this question on the theory that the Republican Party raised the tariff instead of lowering it. Will you not accept your own authority, which you have furnished us in the report on this bill, and cease to make these statements in the future? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, there is another feature about this: All through this report the idea is conveyed—and you have always endeavored to impress it upon the country—that a tariff is a tax always added to the cost of the goods. I will not take your time to read all of the statements, because I have much that I want to say to you. I have much that I think ought to be said to you. Let me read one or two of these extracts, and see whether I have drawn a correct inference:

By this measure agricultural tools and implements of every kind are placed on the free list in order to remove or prevent any possible discrimination against our farmers—

I will talk about that later—in the price of these necessary articles, and to place them on an equal footing with their competitors elsewhere in the world.

Also:

As our population has increased, our exports of foodstuffs and food products have declined and imports increased; under these circumstances, duties on these articles have become a heavier burden on the people.

If that language means anything, it means that every duty that is laid on an article coming into the United States adds an equal amount to the cost of the domestic manufacture or to the price which the domestic buyer pays. So I have followed this proposition a little further, and I have thought I would see how much the Payne bill, in the reductions which you yourselves now acknowledge were made—has saved to the American public—and I have taken Table 2, on page 10, which gives the domestic consumption of each one of these things which you propose to put upon the free list, and have applied to those amounts the percentages by which you admit the Payne bill was reduced, with the following results: Now, understand me, this is the Democratic argument carried to its logical conclusion. If the Democratic contention is good for anything in the report—which I deny—it is good in this showing:

Articles.	Consumption 1905 (Table 2, p. 10).	Reduction in Payne bill (Table 4, p. 11).	Annual saving to people on these 10 schedules by the Payne bill, on Democratic authority.
		Per cent.
Agricultural implements	$90,637,110	4.69	$4,250,880
Bagging for cotton sacks, burlaps, etc	26,031,644	1.90	494,601
Cotton ties, hoop or band iron	12,639,953	20.14	2,545,686
Leather, boots, shoes, harness, saddles, saddlery, etc	493,005,263	26.04	128,358,568
Barbed wire and other fence wire, wire rods, strands, ropes, etc	113,027,205	.04	45,210
Fresh and preserved meats	614,895,219	2.25	13,835,142
Lumber, laths, and shingles	699,599,293	4.76	33,300,924
Sewing machines, and parts of	8,497,464	15	1,274,619
Salt	9,540,824	.29	27,618
Total	2,067,873,975	.....	184,133,248
Flour and grist, cereals, and bread	665,041,533	[1] 1.48	.....
Total consumption	2,732,915,508	.....	.....

[1] Increase in Payne bill (Table 4, p. 11).

Annual saving to the people on these 10 schedules by the Payne bill, on Democratic authority	$184,133,248
Annual increase of cost to the people on flour and grist, cereals, and bread by the Payne bill, on Democratic authority	9,842,614
Total saving	174,290,634

Or a reduction of 6.38 per cent ad valorem.

This is the Democratic showing now for the Payne bill.

Are we as Republicans not entitled to a retraction of all statements heretofore made about upward revision and repudiated pledges?

The Democratic majority of the Ways and Means Committee are now meeting by themselves in a locked room, safely guarded by watchmen at the doors and in the corridors, refusing not only public hearings, but declining even to talk in confidence to the members of the press, and doing precisely as their Republican predecessors have been charged with doing in every respect. I do not find any fault with it, but it was thrown at the Republican candidates for Congress in Connecticut by our governor and other speakers on the stump that we made the Payne bill in secrecy. What are you doing? Let it go out to the country that you are making your free-trade bill precisely as the Republican Ways and Means Committee made the Payne tariff bill, in secrecy in guarded rooms.

Mr. MANN. And without a hearing.

Mr. HILL. And without hearings that were asked for by us.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. I will.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Will not the gentleman concede that there are about 10,000 printed pages of hearings taken only two years ago?

Mr. HILL. Taken by the Republican Ways and Means Committee; and for the last two years they have been denounced on every stump in the country as prejudiced and unfair. You now confirm the Republican position in that respect as you have confirmed it by your statement in regard to the upward revision. You acknowledge the hearings were fair and impartial. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Will not the gentleman from Connecticut admit that the basis of the secret conclave of the Republican predecessors was leveled at the idea that the protected interests conspired in secret with them to produce the rate they gave us? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HILL. I admit nothing of the kind, and the gentleman will not charge it. Every hearing was public, and I admit you are just as fair as we were and no fairer, but we were denounced for it through the whole campaign. The only difference is that we gave open public hearings for two and a half months and you gave none whatever. That is another mistake that was made during the campaign. In view of these facts and as the Ways and Means Committee are now desperately struggling to make a tariff on wool which will not be reflected in the necessarily high rates on the finished fabric and so be distasteful to the American people, I will temporarily withhold a statement I prepared for publication to be signed by the members of that committee at their convenience. Let me read it:

To the people of the United States:

We the undersigned, OSCAR W. UNDERWOOD, of Alabama; CHOICE B. RANDELL, of Texas; FRANCIS BURTON HARRISON, of New York; WILLIAM G. BRANTLEY, of Georgia; DORSEY W. SHACKLEFORD, of Missouri; CLAUDE KITCHIN, of North Carolina; OLLIE M. JAMES, of Kentucky; HENRY T. RAINEY, of Illinois; LINCOLN DIXON, of Indiana; WILLIAM HUGHES, of New Jersey; CORDELL HULL, of Tennessee; W. S. HAMMOND, of Minnesota; ANDREW J. PETERS, of Massachusetts; and A. MITCHELL PALMER, of Pennsylvania, having joined in a unanimous report in favor of H. R. 4413, and having with that report submitted Table No. 4, showing the respective ad valorem rate of duties with relation to articles carried by that bill for the year ending June 30, 1905, and the year ending June 30, 1910, and finding that such ad valorems show a reduction from the law of 1897 to the law of 1909, known as the Payne bill, on agricultural implements of 4.69 per cent, on bagging, etc., of 1.9 per cent, on cotton ties of 20.14 per cent, on leather, etc., of 26.04 per cent, on wire of 0.04 per cent, on fresh meat of 2.25 per cent, on lumber of 4.76 per cent, on sewing machines of 15 per cent, and on salt of 0.29 per cent, and an increase on flour, cereals, and bread of 1.48 per cent, making a net reduction under the Payne bill on these items of 6.38 per cent, hereby acknowledge that we have been mistaken in our estimate of the Payne bill from the time that it was passed by Congress until now, including the statements made on page 3 of said report, and admit to the people of this country that the campaign of last fall was made under this mistaken impression, and that we now are compelled by the document submitted by ourselves and approved by all of us, to admit our error, and will hereafter give due credit to the statements of the Republican Party of this country that the Payne bill as a whole was a substantial revision downward.

Do you not think they ought to do it? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Will not the gentleman admit that many of the so-called reductions of the Payne-Aldrich bill were reductions only in name, and not in fact, because they left the rate still prohibitive?

Mr. HILL. Oh, no; I do not admit anything. [Laughter.] I am making statements of my own and in my own way. Meanwhile, while the members of the committee are engaged in their arduous labors, I will hold this document for them to sign, and if there are any other repentant sinners on that side, who wish to get in early, an opportunity will be given now. Copies will be sent for their signatures to Gov. Baldwin, of Connecticut; Gov. Wilson, of New Jersey; Gov. Harmon, of Ohio; William Jennings Bryan, of Nebraska; and Herman Ridder, of New York; and to the chairmen of both congressional committees, for publication in the next campaign textbooks of the two parties. [Laughter.]

Now, I do not mean by anything that I have said to claim that the Payne bill or the law as it now stands on the statute books has no mistakes in it. I do not mean even to claim that the reductions in rates of duty were made to the extent which I think the country expected, and such as I personally felt that the situation then justified. As the bill left the House of Representatives it was a most excellent measure, and if the conference report had come back to us for final adoption substantially on the lines of the original bill, I think the country would have accepted it with equanimity and a considerable degree of satisfaction, and, in my judgment, we would have carried the congressional elections last fall and the present tariff agitation would not have existed. But that is ancient history now. The question is, What is our present duty? Believing, as I sincerely do, that the Nation at large is in favor of a protective-tariff system fairly and equitably applied, I am in hearty sympathy with the President of the United States and the national platform of the Republican Party in the declaration, "that the true measure of protection is the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad," and I would subject every item and every schedule of the present tariff law to such a test at the hands of an impartial bipartisan——

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. If the gentleman pursues that rule to its logical conclusion, what is there that is going to induce the importation of anything into this country?

Mr. HILL. What is going to give you any revenue from the course that you are pursuing.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. The gentleman has not answered my question.

Mr. HILL. And the gentleman has not answered mine [laughter]; and I would subject every item and every schedule of the present tariff law to such a test at the hands of an impartial bipartisan board of experts, and with such a report and after such a thorough and patient investigation, with the facts before us, I would correct any inaccuracies or injustice either to the producer—and there are some to the producers in the Payne bill—or to the consumer, that such an investigation might show.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I would like to ask the gentleman if he has had his attention called to the fact that the Tariff Board now in existence has made a report upon the amount of farm wages paid in Canada?

Mr. HILL. Oh, yes; I have read the report thoroughly.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. And that the Canadian board has made a similar report, and that they vary about 50 per cent.

Mr. HILL. Oh, I have read it thoroughly, and I have studied the Canadian Yearbook. But, using a slang phrase, "my eyes are fixed" on the reciprocity question, and there is no use of the gentleman saying anything about it.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I am not talking about reciprocity. I am talking about a Tariff Board that is 50 per cent away from the truth.

Mr. HILL. This is the policy, I will say to my colleague on the Ways and Means Committee, pursued by our great commercial rivals in Europe——

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman does not answer my question. I asked him if he thinks that a Tariff Board which has already made one report that is 50 per cent away from the truth could be of very much value to anybody in any other report it might make.

Mr. HILL. The logical inference of the gentleman's question is that there can be no basis on which a tariff is laid except guesswork, and I do not believe——

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Then what good will a Tariff Board do you?

Mr. HILL. I want them to do the work and ascertain the facts. This is the policy pursued by our great commerical rivals, and in my judgment it is one which we might well follow, and thus save ourselves from recurring periods of industrial stagnation such as we are now experiencing, alternating with prosperity or panic. So much for that.

I propose now, Mr. Chairman, to take up the bill itself and try to analyze it and discuss it as well as I can. It is a bill to place on the free list certain agricultural implements, cotton bagging, and so forth. There are in the world to-day three kinds of revenue systems—one English free trade, one a tariff for revenue, and one a protective system. English free trade means high duties on luxuries, but everything else free. A tariff for revenue only means high duties on luxuries and everything else taxed at the lowest possible point which will give sufficient revenue to maintain the Government. A protective tariff, like both of the other systems, means a high tax on luxuries, a duty on imported competing articles equaling the difference in cost of production at home and abroad, and everything else free.

I think in the last session of Congress the gentleman who now honors the House of Representatives and the American people by occupying the Speaker's chair made a speech on this floor in which he said that the Democratic policy would be to have a tariff on everything, and then in a low voice added, "There will be no free list, or a very small one, if any." Am I right about that? "No free list, or a very small one, if any." And yet the Democratic Party starts out with a policy which puts $2,700,000,000 of the annual consumption of the American people on the free list in one bill. "No free list, but a very small one, if any."

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. That is the prelude to the play.

Mr. HILL. I want to know in which classification this bill comes, whether in English free trade, tariff for revenue, or under the protective-tariff system? It is a hybrid. It does not bear classification with any existing system in the world. This bill has none of these policies, and it is distinctly announced on this floor—oh, I regret it, and I think the American people will regret it—it is distinctly announced on this floor as the exercise of the taxing power of the Government in the interest of a class. It puts finished products on the free list and leaves duties on the raw materials from which they are made. Some of the manufacturers of Connecticut, as I happen to know, voted the Democratic ticket last fall under the assurance, freely given by the Democratic speakers throughout that State, that if the Democratic ticket was elected, and the Democrats were put in control of the House of Representatives, they would have free raw materials and the duties maintained on their finished products. I think they will wake up in surprise some fine morning, if this bill ever passes, when they find they have dutiable raw materials and free finished products. [Applause on the Republican side.]

But I stand here for the men and women who work in the factories of Connecticut as well as for the men who own them. [Applause on the Republican side.] This bill puts finished products on the free list and leaves the duty on the raw materials from which they are made. It is intended to hit the trusts, and it is openly announced so here, and the names of the various trusts are detailed. Gentlemen will wake up to the fact that this bill helps the trusts instead of hurting them.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Which one?

Mr. HILL. I will show you before I get through. You will not have any occasion to plead ignorance on that subject. It is intended to hit the trusts and helps them by giving them free finished or unfinished parts of their finished products, a thing that was never done before in the history of American tariff legislation.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Specify one of the things you are talking about.

Mr. HILL. I will when I get to it. I am making this speech in my own way.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. All right.

Mr. HILL. In one case it will be destructive of revenue and in the other will change our factories to mere shops for the assembling of the products of foreign factories. If I had my way, I would offer an amendment immediately after the opening clause of the bill.

Where is the man on this floor or elsewhere that can say that this amendment is not fair and right and just to the American people? Yet you will vote it down. You have already announced your intention to vote down every amendment. It would be this:

On page 1, at the end of line 5, insert:

"Provided, That all articles mentioned in this act, if imported from a country which lays an import duty on like articles imported from the United States, shall be subject to the duties existing prior to the passage of this act."

Now, is not that fair? Is not that right? If we are going to surrender to Europe a market of 90,000,000 people with an annual consumption of twenty-seven hundred million dollars on the things named in this bill, is it not fair that Europe should give us a corresponding privilege there, or that we should have some consideration for it?

What about revenues under this bill? Well, at the Treasury a few days ago I was handed a copy of a statement prepared for the press, in which it showed that there would be a loss of revenue by this bill of $10,052,942.35, about 18 per cent on the entire volume of importations covered by this bill that we are going to throw away. Is that right?

Our Democratic friends have tried to whittle that down before the country. They started in with the idea that we were going to lose only a million dollars revenue by it. Then they got up to $10,000,000. Then they subtracted one and one-half million dollars, which would be covered by the Canadian reciprocity. Gentlemen, I tell you that forty or fifty or sixty million dollars will not cover the loss of revenue to the Government if you pass this bill.

If your theory is correct that large importations of these articles are coming in, what about the duties paid on the raw materials used in the manufacture of like articles which are now being made here? Will not those duties also go glimmering if you pass this bill? And how about finished and unfinished parts and repair parts, which are to be free? The Treasury Department, in making this statement, very wisely and very prudently and very cautiously submitted this observation:

While there are certain approximations and certain figures that can not definitely be obtained, the tables indicate the following.

Why did they say that? Because they do not know what is coming in under your bill, and nobody knows. There is not a man on this floor can answer the question, What will come in under this first item? And I am going to ask you very soon. If free, more will be imported, and duties will be lost on the materials entering into those articles formerly made here. No man can tell what the loss of revenue will be by this bill.

Now, let us take up the first item of the bill—

Plows, tooth and disk harrows, headers—

That is a new word not found in the old law—

Harvesters, reapers, agricultural drills and planters, mowers, horse-rakes, cultivators, threshing machines, and cotton gins.

The Dingley law stopped there, and the Wilson law stopped there, and the McKinley law stopped there. In fact, in the McKinley law agricultural implements were not mentioned at all. They came in under the blanket clause, I believe, at 45 per cent.

What did Mr. Wilson, chairman of the Democratic Committee on Ways and Means at that time, do? That committee was composed of good men. I will read you their names. You may have forgotten them. I want to tell you who they were and what they did on this particular question. The Committee on Ways and Means of that Congress consisted of William L. Wilson, of West Virginia; Benton McMillin, of Tennessee; Henry G. Turner, of Georgia, a splendid man and a great lawyer; Alexander B. Montgomery, of Kentucky; Justin R. Whiting, of Michigan; W. Bourke Cockran, of New York; Moses T. Stevens, of Massachusetts; William J. Bryan, of Nebraska; William D. Bynum, of Indiana; Clifton R. Breckinridge, of Arkansas; John C. Tarsney, of Missouri; Thomas B. Reed, of Maine; SERENO E. PAYNE, of New York; Julius C. Burrows, of Michigan; JOHN DALZELL, of Pennsylvania; Albert J. Hopkins, of Illinois; and John H. Gear, of Iowa. What did they do? They stopped there, and then they added this clause:

Provided, That all articles mentioned in this paragraph, if imported from a country which lays an import duty on like articles imported from the United States, shall be subject to the duties existing prior to the passage of this act.

That duty was 45 per cent. A Democratic Congress did that. A Democratic Ways and Means Committee did that under the leadership of William L. Wilson and during the administration of your patron saint and greatest President, Grover Cleveland. They provided that those articles "shall be subject to the duties existing prior to the passage of this act."

What happened then? Then came on the Dingley law, and in that law Mr. Dingley made a provision that reduced the duties on agricultural machinery from 45 per cent, with a possible free list, down to 20 per cent. What did the gentleman from New York, the Hon. SERENO E. PAYNE, and his associates on the committee do? They cut that duty from 20 per cent to 15 per cent, and provided that agricultural implements should be free, specifying what they were, coming from any country which would admit our agricultural implements free. It was done at the request of the manufacturers of agricultural implements. You propose to give the market away without any consideration and without knowing what, under the terms of this section, you are giving away. I do not say it disrespectfully, but no man can possibly know. You are giving it away for nothing. Now, let us see what it is:

Farm wagons and farm carts.

What are they? An oxcart in Maine; a prairie schooner covered with canvas duck, drawn by a six-mule team, out in Arizona. There are on the farms to-day in Kansas, and I am glad of it, auto trucks. Every conceivable thing in the way of a wheeled vehicle can come in under that provision. That is not all. That is trivial compared to the language which follows:

And all other agricultural implements of any kind and description, whether specifically mentioned herein or not.

That is broad enough, is it not? It sweeps every schedule. It does away with the provision of the law that a general clause is not effective where an article is specifically named, and it says here that everything in the whole range of tariff duties, among 4,000 items, that can be construed as an agricultural implement, is included; and your committee, in making their report, add the words "agricultural tools," so that they get them all in—tools and implements of any kind and description, whether specifically mentioned herein or not, whether in whole or in parts, including repair parts.

Could it be made broader? This bill ought to be recommitted to the committee for further enlightenment on that section alone, without reference to anything else in it, in justice to the American people. Why should we not have reciprocal free trade if we are going to have free trade at all?

We passed a tariff bill two years ago, and one of the principal features of it was a maximum and minimum rate. Why did not you fix the free list as the minimum and let the President negotiate with the other countries of the world for special advantages to American commerce in consideration of it? But no, you could not do that. In the eagerness to get to an absolutely free basis you used language in the first three lines which absolutely sweeps out of existence, so far as these items are concerned, the maximum system adopted in the Payne tariff bill. You say no duties shall be charged on these things. Could you not trust the present administration? Could you not trust the administration which you hope to have two years from now, but which you will never get with this policy, gentlemen? Make no mistake about that. [Applause on the Republican side.] Could not you trust such an administration to negotiate for the best interests of the American people and offer to make your free list the minimum, with the possibilities of negotiation by the administration for privileges and for trade relations which now they are wholly unable to get?

Finished and unfinished parts. A little while ago a gentleman asked me about the question of finished parts. A day or two ago I went down town to an agricultural machinery store. I wanted to know what this bill covered. I had repeatedly asked Members of the House on both sides what this language included, and no one seemed to know.

Agricultural implements of every kind and description, finished or unfinished, whether specifically mentioned herein or not.

I went into one store and asked for the International Harvester Co.'s catalogue. They said they had not got it; but they handed me out one after another these nine different pamphlets which I have here, and they had a lot more. I said I had as many as I wanted to carry. I have here the catalogue of the Bucher & Gibbs Plow Co. Look at it, gentlemen. Look at the different forms of manufacture of every kind and character. If I was a plow manufacturer and there was a duty of $2.50 a ton on pig iron, as there is now, and I wanted to escape that duty, I would send to Belgium or to England or to Germany and make a contract to have iron run directly from the blast furnace into the form of plowshares instead of pig iron, and import 10,000 tons of plowshares free of duty, under that clause "agricultural implements or parts thereof," and use them for what I saw fit when I got them here.

There would be no way to stop it, and nobody in the United States could stop its being done. [Applause on the Republican side.] "Parts of implements." Here are plows, a whole book full of cuts, and springs and wires and everything entering into the construction of plows and harrows. Here are corn planters, buggy planters. You can buy the wheels in Europe and put them together here. I say to the gentleman, the Speaker of this House, that with this bill in operation the zinc industry in Missouri will go a glimmering under the provisions for free finished and unfinished parts. There is not a mowing machine, a harvesting machine, there is not an auto cart, but that has steel antifriction ball bearings or antifriction journal boxes, the metallic parts of which are made of zinc, antimony, or lead. I can take the cast-iron journal boxes in the rough, made in Europe, run Babbitt metal into them, and the duties which I would escape under this bill of $12.50 a ton on lead, $27.50 a ton on zinc, $30 per ton on antimony, and $16 per ton on iron castings would more than pay for the cost of the work and the freight besides for getting them over here. This is only a single illustration of countless other things which can be done under that clause of the bill. Go and tell that, you men of Missouri, to your constituents who produce lead, zinc, and antimony.

And so I might go through with all these various items.

Now, there are gentlemen on the floor from Texas. All through these items are wool parts; take the linings to saddles and harness, white serge and the wool parts, dutiable at 142 per cent. These can be imported free of duty under the provisions of this bill. Where are your Texas men who want high duties on wool under the new Democratic program? Are you going to vote for it? Not only that, but your harnesses and horse blankets, and so on. Here is spraying machinery. I said to an official in the Treasury Department this morning, "Is that admitted as an agricultural implement under the bill?" He said, "It is a matter of doubt." I said, "You can not raise potatoes without it." He said, "It might be construed as a special instrument." I said, "You could not raise fruit without it; we are spraying all the old apple trees in New England, and we have to have the spraying machine in order to bring them back to life again." California fruit farms must have spraying machines. You have got to admit every one of them under the terms of this bill.

Now, here is the McCormick reaper. There is not a schedule in the tariff bill, not one, but that will be absolutely smashed to pieces under this privilege of admitting free finished and unfinished parts of these and like articles.

And so I might go on. And then we come to the International Harvester Co. Now, I am not in sympathy with the International Harvester Co. or any other trust. I do not believe that J. P. Morgan wants any sympathy from me. I did not have the committee report to read last Monday night, but I read the newspaper coming down from Connecticut, and in it I found the annual report of the International Harvester Co. for 1910. Their preferred capital stock is $80,000,000, common stock $60,000,000. They earned last year $21,000,000 net income. They paid a dividend on the common stock of $3,200,000; on the preferred stock of $4,200,000. They had a surplus of $7,300,000 and undivided profits this year, after paying dividends, of $8,684,000. Total surplus was $16,000,000. They are not objects of sympathy. They do not ask it. They came before us, all these manufacturers two years ago, and they said frankly, "We are perfectly willing that you should put these specified articles on the free list and we will take our chances with the rest of the world—that will give us an equal chance."

Now, you will not tell that to your farmers in the South and West; you will not tell them that the Payne bill already does this, but it does do it. You want them to think this is a new proposition, a new discovery which you have made. You are two years behind the times and you always are. [Applause on the Republican side.] Now, the International Co. did $100,000,000 worth of trade last year. How was that trade divided up?

It was divided up in this way. On harvesting machinery, tillage implements, and so forth, United States trade, $37,000,000; foreign trade, $25,000,000; total, $62,000,000. Wagons, spreaders, gasoline engines, and so forth—notice what you are getting into, gasoline engines and parts thereof free as agricultural implements—United States, eighteen millions; foreign trade, eight millions; miscellaneous goods, fibers, and so forth, ten millions. Now, gentlemen, do you know what you have done? Under that provision of finished or unfinished parts you have given them at least $10,000,000 a year—at least that. Take agricultural implements. How many reapers and binders in the whole, as a complete machine, are going to be imported into the United States, if they are absolutely free? Not one. The freight would stop it. What have you done? They have got their factories on the other side, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] told us the other day, in three or four European countries. Will they move over there and send the finished machines here? No; because they are largely made of lumber, which they can get cheaper here than they can in Europe.

But they will get the finished metallic parts over there from their own factories on the other side and make an assembling shop here, and get every penny of duty on those things remitted under the terms of your bill. You talk about helping the farmer! Do you suppose you will get those agricultural implements one single cent cheaper because of this? Do you not know they can make those implements cheaper by getting the parts made on the other side and using the lumber here? It is not only so with agricultural implements. Any manufacturer would select and make up the things at home from material which he could get at the best advantage at home, and he would import the finished parts made from materials which he could get at the best advantage abroad, and so make simply an assembling shop of the United States. The remark that I made when I came in, that the room as it then looked reminded me of the way an American workshop would appear by and by, was justified by the fact that under this policy experienced machinists and mechanics will be looking in vain for work, while men who are simply assemblers will be left in the almost deserted shops under your policy. You can not get away from that proposition. It is human nature to do it, and, of course, they will do it.

Now, take up patented articles. Do you expect the farmer is going to buy any patented agricultural machinery any cheaper? But the manufacturer can make it cheaper, and he will take the profit. So that instead of contributing to the benefit of the farmer by your proposition, you are directly and absolutely putting from 10 to 15 per cent of the cost of production of these articles right into the pockets of the trusts, and they do not need it. It is a work of supererogation in most cases. They are getting along pretty well as they are. Why should a Democratic majority come in here and build up their business and make additional profits for them under these circumstances, under the plea that they are going to help the farmer? On all patented articles this means reduced cost to the producer, less revenue to the Government, and the same price to the consumer. I think the time is coming, and it may be somewhat radical for me to say it, but I think the time is coming in this country when the United States in granting a monopoly under a patent will reserve to itself in some way the right to determine at any time whether the price at which the product is sold is reasonable or not.

Now, under this first schedule how much do we consume? In all these figures I give you Democratic authority, as I have from the beginning. We consume $90,000,000 worth annually. What are we giving away? England, Germany, and France are our only competitors. We have free trade with England now in plows, tooth and disk harrows, harvesters, reapers, agricultural drills and planters, mowers, horserakes, cultivators, thrashing machines, and cotton gins. But this bill opens our market to the whole world, not only on these things, but on every conceivable kind of agricultural tools and implements, such as scythes, hoes, shovels, axes, pruning knives, traction engines, and all kinds of farm machinery. The market of Great Britain is open and free to-day to us on all of these things. Not so with Germany and France. What do they charge us? To get into Germany our manufacturers pay on cultivators, potato diggers and harrows, 12 per cent duty; on plows, 9 per cent; on forks for hay and manure, and so forth, 4 per cent; on motor-driven plows and reaper machinery, 6 per cent; on thrashing machines, 7 per cent; on other agricultural machines, 12 per cent; on wagons and carts, 6 per cent; and on all of them alike, 11 per cent to get into France, and you say come over and take this magnificent market of 92,000,000 of people and keep your doors closed to us. That is your Democratic policy.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HILL. I will.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. The gentleman's whole argument seems to be directed in the interest of the American manufacturer. He pays no attention to the consumer. Our bill is designed for the relief of the American consumer.

Mr. HILL. Not at all; it is the other way. I am complaining that by your legislation your are benefiting the trusts and not helping the consumer. You will not benefit the farmer, and I am complaining that you will deprive the United States Government of needed revenues, and I regret that the gentleman has not yet succeeded—I regret on my own part—in getting hold of the drift and tendency of my argument. [Applause on the Republican side.] So much for the market of the world given free on agricultural implements. Let us take up the next proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman such time as he may wish to use.

Mr. HILL. I will take but little time; I am going through it hurriedly.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Will the gentleman permit a question here?

Mr. HILL. At any time.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. How will it help any trust to give free the American market for the machinery of which you speak?

Mr. HILL. It is helping the trusts——

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Which trust?

Mr. HILL. We give them the privilege of importing finished or unfinished parts made by the cheaper labor of Europe, and I have seen it, and will tell you of it if I have the time, not from statistics, not from consular tables, but from my own personal observation and experience. You allow them to bring them in here free, and so lessen the revenues, and yet have no possible way by which the price to the consumer is to be lessened, especially on patented articles. [Applause on the Republican side.] My friends, you have a good deal to think about when you tackle 4,000 items in a tariff bill.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Ask him another question.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON] suggests that I ask you one more question.

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I asked the gentleman a while ago how permitting the American consumer to have a free market in machinery will help any trust, and you have not explained that to me; but I will ask the gentleman what particular trust will be benefited by allowing——

Mr. HILL. And I have said already, the International Harvester Co., which makes their machines on the other side. They can import them, if profitable, complete; that is, made up. You give them the privilege of importing such parts as they can make cheaper over there, such parts as cost them more here, put them together, and you have no way in the world of compelling them to sell their product cheaper to the American farmer. Now, will you help or hurt them?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Does the gentleman mean to say the International Harvester Co. has a factory on the other side?

Mr. HILL. I stated that the gentleman from Illinois the other day named three or four countries in which they had their factories.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Why have they taken their money and labor from this country when they can do better here, or——

Mr. HILL. They use their factories there now to supply the foreign markets. You want them to use them to bring their finished and unfinished products over here. We want the work done in American workshops.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Why do not they stay here and make their machinery——

Mr. HILL. I do not care to discuss the question with the gentleman any further, as I do not seem to be able to make it clear to him; but I want to say this to the gentleman, that there is a vast difference between criticizing, as you have been doing for 16 years, and assuming the responsibility, as you have got to do now. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, the grave error that the gentleman assumes does not still answer the question I put to him, and that is, why it is that an American monopoly finds it more profitable to go abroad and to take labor abroad than to stay here?

Mr. HILL. If I have not answered the question, I can not answer, and I shall have to ask the gentleman not to interrupt me further on that point.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Tell it over to him. Tell him it is labor, among other things. Tell it to him, so that he will understand that.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. If the gentleman does not want to be interrupted, I beg his pardon.

Mr. HILL. I do not mind being interrupted, but I do not like to be asked the same question two or three times.

The next schedule is:

Bagging for cotton, gunny cloth, and all similar fabrics, materials, or coverings suitable for covering and baling cotton, composed, in whole or in part, of jute, jute butts, hemp, flax, seg, Russian seg, New Zealand tow, Norwegian tow, aloe, mill waste, cotton tares—

If they had stopped there it would have been all right and the articles to be imported would have been fairly well defined and restricted. But the whole world is thrown open, for it says further:

Or any other materials or fibers suitable for covering cotton; and burlaps and bags or sacks composed wholly or in part of jute or burlaps or other material suitable for bagging or sacking agricultural products.

What are they? There is not a fiber, there is not a fabric, there is not a material made on earth but that can be brought into the ports of the United States under that language free of duty. It is absolutely all-embracing, as the language is in the first section under the agricultural-implement bill. Now, there was not any necessity for your doing that, not the slightest.

There is a man in this House on the Democratic side who has made a study of this bagging question, and I am sorry he is not here, for he could have given you an intelligent proposition to refer to this House. I refer to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT], who is entitled to great credit on the Democratic side, and ought to receive it from his constituents, for his earnest, faithful, intelligent effort to get free cotton bagging for them. [Applause.] But he has done it in a straightforward way. He has not put in a proposition that takes in the whole world. This is the amendment he offered to the Payne tariff bill a few years ago:

On page 2, beginning with line 3, to and including line 9, strike out the whole paragraph and insert.

"Bagging for cotton, gunny cloth, and similar fabrics, suitable for covering cotton, composed of single yarns made of jute or jute butts or hemp, not bleached, dyed, colored, stained, painted, or printed, not exceeding 16 threads to the square inch, counting the warp and filling, and weighing not less than 15 ounces per square yard."

Any man knows what that means. No man knows what this means in this bill. Why do you not follow the intelligent advice of men on your side who have given study to these questions in the years gone by? You put an all-embracing proviso in there that will take in every foundation fabric for every piece of oilcloth that is made in the United States and allow the trust to bring it in.

You will allow every Fertilizer Trust to bring in bags under that provision free. Do you believe the farmers of the South will get fertilizer one cent cheaper because of the little bit of duty that is taken off those bags? Do you suppose the United States Steel Trust, the largest producer of cement in the United States, will concede a fraction of a cent because of the duty being taken off bagging in which they sell the cement? The farmer does not buy the bag at all. He sends the bag back again, and every cent of rebate of duty will go into the cash boxes of these trusts.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Always.

Mr. HILL. The gentleman says "Always." The custom of trade enters into and controls these things. You have taken these duties off, and in every single case there the trust will get the benefit of it and the farmers not a single cent.

This thing goes further than you seem to have foreseen. The United States Steel Co. does not need any sympathy from the Democratic Party. The Fertilizer Trust does not need any sympathy from the Democratic Party. And yet you are forcing upon them a cheaper article for them to use—no, not a cheaper article, but the same article at a less cost—under the plea that you are giving it to the farmer, when the farmer will never know it. Now, there are three trusts that I have told you are going to be benefited by this proposition. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Why, you have brought in free bagging that covers the oriental rugs that cost hundreds and hundreds of dollars apiece. Is this for the benefit of the farmers? Every yard of carpet that comes into the United States will come in with its covering free, and I do not know but that you have repealed section 18 of the administrative act, which provides that the covering on any article coming into the United States on an ad valorem basis, or on any article on which the duty is fixed by reason of value in any way, shall be dutiable. Have you thought about it? If you are going to make bags free to the farmer, why do you not make free cartons, bottles, crates, boxes, casks, barrels, hogsheads, jars, and containers of every kind which are referred to in section 18? That section provides that they shall be dutiable on ad valorem importations. Does your provision here repeal that, or does it not? If it does, you have swept millions out of the Treasury of the United States in the loss of revenue in order to get $700,000 to give to the southern cotton growers free cotton bagging. Nobody can tell what is lost.

You have gone at this thing apparently in a hurry to get this bill in here. I can not account for it in any other way. Why, the Wilson bill had this provision in regard to cotton bagging—not as clear as the amendment offered by Mr. BARTLETT, but still clear enough so that you could determine what it was that was to be free under the law—"bagging for cotton, gunny cloth, and all similar materials suitable for covering cotton, composed in whole or in part of hemp, flax, jute, or jute butts," limited by the restriction of the material. But you say, "any material suitable for covering"; not only cotton, but any other agricultural product of any kind or character—potatoes, apples, grapes, or anything; anything that you see fit to put in a bag.

Now, gentlemen, I submit to you, in view of the necessities of the Treasury of the United States, that the language of neither of these schedules is wise legislation, and on either proposition the bill ought to be recommitted to the committee for further consideration. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The consumption of the United States of the articles named in this clause is $26,000,000. Germany charges us 18 per cent on these things for taking them in there. France charges us 21 per cent. You propose to let them in here for nothing. Marvelous generosity!

Let us take the next item:

Hoop or band iron, or hoop or band steel, cut to lengths, punched or not punched, or wholly or partly manufactured into hoops or ties, coated or not coated with paint or any other preparation, with or without buckles or fastenings, for baling cotton or any other commodity; and wire for baling hay, straw, and other agricultural products.

Is a rose an agricultural product? Are violets agricultural products? Is the wire that surrounds your buttonhole bouquet to come in free? Who is going to draw the line? Men get their living in my country by raising those things, just as they do in the West by raising wheat and corn. Who is going to draw the line? This paragraph takes in every form of wire. I appeal to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] if this and the next succeeding section do not take in every form of wire, even wire rope, under the provisions of this bill, and every dollar of duties on those things the Treasury will lose.

Now, I will admit—I suppose all my colleagues will not agree with me in what I am going to say now—that the southern farmer has just as good a right to a free cotton tie as the northern farmer has to free binding twine. I will admit that neither ought to be free. We ought not to apply tariff rates by favoritism. I hope the time for that sort of thing has gone by and that it will never be done again; and as I said before, I regret from the bottom of my heart that the Democratic Party, in view of its criticisms of our action with regard to binding twine in the past, has now fallen from its high estate and got down to administering tariffs as a matter of privilege. It ought not to be done by anybody.

On this item the home consumption is $12,639,953, and Germany charges us on wire 14 per cent to get into her ports and on barbed wire 22 per cent, and we are to give our market to them for nothing.

Grain, buff, split, rough and sole leather, band, bend, or belting leather, boots and shoes made wholly or in chief value of leather made from cattle hides and cattle skins of whatever weight, of cattle of the bovine species, including calfskins; and harness, saddles, and saddlery, in sets or in parts, finished or unfinished, composed wholly or in chief value of leather.

Does that last clause refer to the sets or does it refer to the parts? Are saddlery hardware, buckles, trace chains, and all of those things to come in free? No man can say. No man in the Treasury Department will construe that language.

Harness is to be brought in whole. It can be brought in in sets or in parts, composed wholly or in chief value of leather. Is the part to be in chief value of leather, or the whole harness? Is saddlery hardware to come in free also?

And leather—

Now, gentlemen, pay attention to this—

And leather cut into shoe uppers or vamps or other forms suitable for conversion into manufactured articles.

Now, every hat manufacturer in my district will hold up his hands in glee at that proposition. Why? Because he can take the sweat leather that goes into the hat and bring it in free. But there are men in my district who buy the skins, who finish them, or pay a duty of 15 per cent on the dressed skin, and who cut them up into sweat leathers and bag linings for the bags that the ladies carry in their hands. They do that work and that only, and this proposition will absolutely exterminate every one of them in the United States, and you know it. A leather duty of 15 per cent and the finished article coming in free. Why, there is not a rubber belt on an agricultural machine or engine but what will come in free as a finished part. There is not a leather belt, there is not a single item of the metal schedule from one end to the other but what will come in free as finished or unfinished parts.

Calfskin shoes.

Finished calfskins are dutiable at 15 per cent, shoes are to be free. Is that wise legislation? Now, stop and think of it just a minute. Just think of the consideration that must have been given to this bill to bring about this result. I am not saying that the consideration was unintelligent. I am simply saying that these gentlemen, able, skillful, wise, and good legislators, have not taken time enough to perfect this bill and put it before Congress for the considerate action of Congress, and it ought to go back to the committee, and every single schedule that I have mentioned ought to be reconstructed and rewritten.

Take a saddle. Do you stop to think that I can bring in a saddle here free, and yet the lining is dutiable at 142 per cent. You think it is made of leather. Most of them are made of pigskin. Pigskin is dutiable at 15 per cent. Saddle trees are dutiable at 35 per cent. The Payne bill cut saddlery down to 20 per cent, all the manufacturers could possibly stand. They said they could not go lower without going out of business. It went from 45 per cent down to 20 per cent in the Payne bill. You now say practically that we will wipe out the industry and turn it over to England.

Saddle trees, 35 per cent duty, and the finished product to be free. Where do you suppose the American industry is coming out under these circumstances? Two and three-quarter billion dollars of production annually affected by such legislation as that. We had a consumption in the United States on this schedule alone last year, or in 1905, according to the Democratic authority, of $493,000,000. What do you suppose it costs us to get into foreign markets? Oh, but you say we can make shoes and saddles and harnesses and sell them all over the world. Yes; I have seen them all over the world. The last time I saw them was in Belgrade and in Cologne. I have seen American shoes in foreign shop windows, and right alongside, shoes of American pattern of foreign make, and alongside of both other shoes of foreign style and manufacture, and the American shoe has sold in every case for 50 cents more a pair than any other. They were worth it. They are works of art compared with shoes made anywhere else in the wide world. They bring the money. You say it is because of the activity, because of the energy, because of the determination of the American manufacturers to carry their products to the ends of the earth, that they can do it cheaper. They do not; they get a higher price almost invariably. You do not see any cheap shoes exported. They are high-class, first-class shoes, works of art as compared with those of England, Germany, or France.

Now, what do our shoe manufacturers pay to get in there? You say they will go in for nothing. Oh, no; for Germany says that you shall pay 2 per cent on cut uppers, 12 per cent on shoes, 6 per cent on sole leather, 3 per cent on bovine leather, 5 per cent on harness, and 5 per cent on saddlery leather.

What about France? France says you shall pay 8 per cent to get in on uppers. You will not get in your soles; they will be worn out. [Laughter.]

Mr. OLMSTED. They will be walking on their uppers. [Laughter.]

Mr. HILL. Saddlery and harness, 11 per cent, and yet you propose to give to the foreigner our market of 90,000,000 of people for nothing.

Now, I think I can safely speak about some of these industries. The shoe industry is an industry of New England. It is almost a crime for a man to be from New England on this floor, judging by the denunciation I have heard of the New England manufacturers. But the shoe industry is not a Connecticut industry. There are about nine shoe shops manufacturing shoes in Connecticut, with a half a million dollars invested. Nine shops out of 1,316 in the whole country, but I speak for an American industry anywhere [applause on the Republican side], just as much for the International Harvester Co. in Illinois as I would for an industry in my own congressional district. I stand for the protection of American labor and the equalization of cost between this and competing countries.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. What about reasonable profits?

Mr. HILL. Oh, I have answered that 50 times within the last 18 months. The gentleman from New York knows the answer just as well and probably better than I do myself, and what is the use in taking up time by answering it again?

Barbed fence wire, wire rods, wire strands or wire rope, wire woven or manufactured for wire fences, and other kinds of wire suitable for fencing, including wire staples.

Dutiable raw materials, free finished products, imports not governed by styles or fashion, but a world-wide product.

Our consumption for last year, or 1905, according to the Democratic figures, was $113,000,000. What are the duties on these articles which the American manufacturer will have to pay to get into the other countries? It is well to figure the cost of this change as we go along. This is a great revolution that is impending. Wire, 14 per cent, and barbed wire, 22 per cent; that is what it costs us to get into Germany.

Now, take the next schedule—beef, veal, mutton, lamb, pork, and meats of all kinds. If it stopped there, I would like to vote with you.

I have been in favor of free meats for years. I am in favor of free fresh meat now. You will not let me vote on a separate schedule in this bill. You say I have got to take all these things, which will demoralize the revenue system of the United States, in order to get a desirable thing; but this schedule is just as unfortunate as any of it, taking it altogether. Let me read the rest of it:

Beef, veal, mutton, lamb, pork, and meats of all kinds, fresh, salted, pickled, dried, smoked, dressed or undressed, prepared or preserved in any manner; bacon, hams, shoulders, lard, lard compounds and lard substitutes; and sausage and sausage meats.

Do you know how much good that is going to do the farmer? Why, I see my friend from Texas here. A few days ago I got a circular from the Cattle Raisers' Association of Texas, and their bitterest complaint is that the United States Government will not enforce the entry of our cattle and meats under any terms—not free—into the countries of Europe. Do you know, gentlemen, you can not take cattle from this country and send them to Europe? The only country that will receive them is England. I am speaking now of France and Germany, and perhaps I ought not to say that England is the only country in Europe; but England will receive them on condition that they are slaughtered at the port of entry. France and Germany will not let them in at all. What do you gain for your farmers in giving them free meats, pickled and preserved in any manner, as well as free fresh meat? Why did you not let the President use this clause to make negotiations with Germany and France and let our meats in there? Why did you not? You can not take canned meat into Germany under any conditions, as I understand it. I did not know but there might be some doubt about that, and so I went down to the Treasury Department and consulted them, and I will tell you what they told me.

First, no cattle, except into England. In the case of Germany, as in the case of France, there is a peculiar prohibition of fresh meat. You can not take fresh meat from the United States into France and Germany unless the viscera accompanies the carcass, and you know that is impossible, going from this country. It can not be done. Why do you not let the farmer get a market for his products in consideration for the one thrown open here?

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. HARDY. I would like to know how in the world the gentleman expects keeping meat on the free list or canned meat off the free list to help Germany. Does Germany ever import any meat into this country?

Mr. HILL. Oh, if the gentleman had studied the question of preferential tariffs between Great Britain and her colonies, he would have found this, that she could not get from some of her colonies preferential rates, because she had nothing to give in exchange for that, being on a free-trade basis. We put ourselves on a free-trade basis, and what have we to give?

Mr. HARDY. Does putting meat on a free-trade basis affect Germany?

Mr. HILL. Why, certainly, Germany will not admit our canned meat under any circumstances, and we admit hers under this proposition free. But Germany has many other things which she desires to send here.

Mr. HARDY. Has Germany got meat enough to export?

Mr. HILL. Oh, Germany buys meat and preserves it and cans it and sends it away, just as I saw Denmark doing, buying butter from all the world and sending it back again to all the world; just as I know prunes are shipped from California to France, prepared and bottled and sent back here and sold as French prunes. That thing is going on all of the time. Why should not we have a fair chance? Why should we surrender everything to them and demand nothing from them? The home consumption under this schedule is $614,895,219, according to Democratic authority. As my time is running out, I will publish with my remarks the duties of Germany and France on all of the items referred to in the bill specifically. Let us go now to the next schedule. If I am not much mistaken, you gentlemen from the Northwest raise durum wheat up there, especially adapted to the making of vermicelli and macaroni, and we ship both the wheat and flour to Italy and Italy ships back to us about 80,000,000 pounds of the manufactured product a year. Why should we not make that macaroni and vermicelli and send it out to all the world? This bill proposes to take all prepared cereal foods and admit them free.

Now, then, does Italy and Germany do that in fair competition? Not at all. Those Governments say to their manufacturers, "We will rebate all your duties that you pay on this American wheat coming in here when it is exported again." Is that all? No; they rebate to an extent and in such a way as to practically offer a bounty besides to get it exported into American markets, and the Democratic Party of the United States proposes to join hands with Germany and Italy in that sort of business, and by giving them a free market here help them to pay a bounty to have American farmers' products prepared and made into cereal foods on the other side of the ocean and shipped back here and sold to our own people. I want that work done here, or I want the markets open and free to both alike. I can not vote for this kind of legislation, gentlemen.

"Prepared cereal foods." What does that mean? What are prepared cereal foods? They are dutiable at 26 per cent in Germany, 45 per cent in France, and to be free in the United States. Ninety millions of people giving away their market without any equivalent concession. Our annual consumption under this schedule is $665,041,533. Take the next item, of lumber. I am in favor of free lumber. Why do not you give it to us in this bill? You have not. Let me read it:

Timber, hewn, sided, or squared, round timber used for spars or in building wharves, shingles, laths, fencing posts, sawed boards, planks, deals, and other lumber, rough or dressed—

Now, that is the language of the old law practically—except boards, planks, deals, and other lumber, of lignum-vitæ, lancewood, ebony, box, granadilla, mahogany, rosewood, satinwood, and all other cabinet woods.

Why do you include shingles and laths? Because they are not in the general language of the present law, and you wanted to bring them in. Why did you not put in clapboards, which the farmer has to have on his house? The American farmer is able to have clapboards on his house. Why did you leave that off? Why did you not put in pickets and palings? The American farmer and workman is able to put pickets and palings around his home and the mechanic to fence in his little cottage. Why did you gentlemen not put those in there? You say you have given them free lumber, but you have not in this bill, not by any manner of means. Do you know it costs more to retie a railroad than to rerail it, taking one year after another? Why did you not give the railroads of this country that if you are in favor of cheaper transportation for the farmer? You said you were going to give them free lumber. You have not done it. This bill ought to go back to the Committee on Ways and Means for reconsideration on every single schedule. [Applause on the Republican side.] We consume $690,000,000 worth of that material in a single year. Now, I do not expect we are going to get much imported from France or Germany.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HILL. Very well.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Is not siding lumber and flooring about the most expensive lumber that goes into the ordinary farmer's house?

Mr. HILL. Except inside trimming. It is more of an item than shingles and more than laths, and ties are more of an item to railroads than the steel rails are.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. In an ordinary house the trimming is not so expensive.

Mr. HILL. I had heard that statement made in regard to railroad ties, and in order to ascertain positively about it I called up the Southern Railway Co. down here and asked that question, and it is just the same down South as it is up North. Why did you not put them on the free list so as to help out with cheaper transportation?

Now, as to sewing machines. The Singer Sewing Machine Co. does not need any sympathy from Congress. They have a factory in Glasgow, employing 12,000 people there, making sewing machines to-day. They also have factories in the United States. I fancy that they can make the ordinary family sewing machine, with the cabinet case and all, cheaper than anybody else in the world, but I do not know positively.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] knows that we discussed making sewing machines free two years ago, and we did not do it because we thought they would make them over there and ship them over here. It would take away the work from American workmen. You can do it, and it will not hurt the company one particle. They can do as the International Harvester people can and probably would do. They can have the cabinet cases—and I am speaking about what I know of their methods—made here and the metallic work on the other side, ship it over here by the ton in finished and unfinished parts, and our men will lose the work and the company will make more money than they did before. And you are putting them on the free list with the hope of helping the farmer.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. You are overlooking the theory on which this bill is written. We have not written it from the gentleman's standpoint of the manufacturer. What we have written here is an endeavor to reduce the cost of living to the people, and when a great industry exports a very large percentage of its manufactures to a foreign country to-day, has factories abroad, it hardly seems to me it carries out the gentleman's argument that if these sewing machines go on the free list they will transfer their factories abroad and ship them back here.

Mr. HILL. Finished parts. They can not afford to ship the finished products, but the parts.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But more than that. I can state—and the gentleman is on the floor, or was a few moments ago, from whom I got the information—that this very company ships sewing machines to the Orient, and lays them down, freight paid, at the wholesale price of $8.25.

Mr. HILL. I do not know about that. I will tell you what I have seen——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Let me finish. They are selling them to the American people to-day from $20 to $30.

Mr. HILL. Yes; at retail, and each sale to a new customer. They are sold on time, on the installment plan, through agencies all over the country. When sold to go abroad they are shipped by the carload, and almost by the shipload. I will say to the gentleman that I have seen them by the cartload, piled up as you would pile hay on a southern farm wagon, carried up the streets of Vladivostock, in eastern Siberia.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly. If the gentleman will allow me to finish.

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. When a great monopoly in this country ships its machines, not the surplus product, but great quantities, as the gentleman testifies himself, abroad, and yet lays tribute on the American people of three or four times their value, I am in favor of putting them on the free list. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HILL. So am I; but I am not in favor of giving those people privileges by which they can make them cheaper here by simply assembling them and taking away the work of American mechanics and having the principal part of it done on the other side. [Applause on the Republican side.] That is my doctrine.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not know how the gentleman will put them on the free list, according to his doctrine.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I would like to ask the gentleman if he does not think it is just about as cheap to ship foreign pauper labor over here and have them do the work as to ship pauper goods over here?

Mr. HILL. Oh, I have heard that for many years. The hardest thing to move is a man. You can take merchandise and pack it up and ship it with a c. o. d. label, and the freight will be paid at the other end. When a man is shipped the freight must be paid in advance.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. HILL. To emigrate means to leave the home, to break the home ties, to separate the family, to go out into the world alone. It takes nerve and courage and resolution to do that. It is infinitely easier to ship the products of a man's toil from Europe than it is to ship the man himself, and you know it. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BUCHANAN. But they ship them in all the same, and the gentleman knows it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I will pass the next item, for it is getting late. The gentleman talks about free labor. Let me tell you something of what I have seen. I was riding through the city of Oxford, in England, one day, and the driver sat on the seat in front of me. I said to him as we were driving along, "Do you own this carriage?" "No," said he; "I hire it." I asked him, "What are your working hours?"

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the House is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. There seems to be some confusion in one part of the Hall. The House will be in order.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to tire the House, but I want to refer to some incidents relating to the cheap labor that the gentleman suggested could be imported.

I was riding in the streets of Oxford one day in a cab, with the driver sitting in front of me, and I said to him as we went down the street, "How much do you get for driving this carriage, or do you own it?" He said, "No; I do not own it. I drive it by the week." "What are your hours? When do you begin?" He said, "From 9 o'clock in the morning." "How long do you work?" said I. "From 9 in the morning until 10 o'clock at night, and if I have a fare I stay with it until it leaves me."

I asked him, "How much do you get?" He said, "I get $2.50 a week." "How old are you?" said I. He said, "I am 55 years old." "Have you a family?" He answered, "Yes; I have a family of five." I asked him, "How in the world do you manage to live?" "Of course, I can not," he said, "but I have a son and daughter at work. The daughter is at work in a linen mill and she gets $2.25 a week, and my son is a printer and gets $2.50 a week, and we manage to get along." There were three people at work, with an aggregate income of $7.25 a week.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Connecticut yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. HILL. I will ask the gentleman to wait until I finish, and then I will answer his question. I said to this driver, "You are 55 years old. You can not save anything. What will you do when you are unable to work?" He said, without cracking a smile, "Do? Why, I expect to go to the poorhouse. What else do you suppose I have been paying poor rates for all these years?" [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. ALLEN. Does the gentleman mind telling the House what tip he paid the driver? [Laughter.]

Mr. HILL. Oh, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Connecticut yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. HILL. Yes; I will yield for any intelligent question, and you would ask none but an intelligent one.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I was very much interested in the story the gentleman was telling, and I accept it as absolutely true, coming as it does from the gentleman.

Mr. HILL. It was true.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. May I ask the gentleman, Did the driver tell him how he managed to eke out a living before that daughter and son grew to an age to be a help to him?

Mr. HILL. The gentleman must answer that for himself. I was riding through the Isle of Wight one day and I stopped to visit a little chapel near the entrance to the Queen's estate, known as Osborne. As I came out of the chapel I saw a man at work in a garden across the street, and I went over and spoke to him. I said, "I am a Yankee, and a tourist, and full of curiosity. Would you think it impertinent on my part if I were to ask you a question?" He said he would not. We were standing in front of a little one-and-a-half-story brick cottage. I said, "Do you own this house?" He said, "No, sir; I am the Queen's farmer." I said, "What do you receive as compensation?" He said, "$5 a week and house rent." Said I, "Is that the usual price here?" Now, I am stating these things in order that you may get the drift of the situation. He said, "No; the usual price is 2.75 to $3 a week in this country."

Do you know what I thought of at once? I thought of a novel called Marcella that I read once, written by Mrs. Humphrey Ward, describing the agricultural population of England under free trade:

> Men of 60 years of age and upward, gray and furrowed, like the chalk soil into which they had worked their lives; not old as age goes, but already the refuse of their generation, and paid for at the rate of refuse, with no prospect but the workhouse if the grave should be delayed.

I do not want any English free trade in the United States. Do you?

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. Just excuse me a moment. I have already taken more time than I should.

Mr. HARDY. I just want to ask one question?

Mr. HILL. I said this carriage driver in Oxford told me that his daughter worked in a linen mill. I had just come from the largest linen mill in the world—the York Street Mills, in Belfast.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. HILL. I will, and then I will finish my story afterwards.

Mr. HARDY. They have a high tariff in Germany. Are the laboring people any better off in high-tariff Germany than they are in free-trade England?

Mr. HILL. Now, really, I do not want to stop in my line of thought to argue out a question of that kind. If you can not draw your own conclusion from the things that I am going to tell you, from what I have seen, no argument that I could make would satisfy you.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman just answer that in one word? He can answer it yes or no, Whether the laboring man is better off in high-tariff Germany than he is in free-trade England?

Mr. HILL. All men are better off that have work to do than men who do not have it.

Mr. HARDY. Well, the gentleman can answer that——

Mr. HILL. I said I did not propose to argue this question out with the gentleman. I propose to go ahead with my statement. I visited the York Street Linen Mill, in Belfast, Ireland. I went through that mill, the largest in the world, and I saw men and women at work there. I will not trust to my memory. I have taken these figures from my diary, as they were taken down by me in the various trips I have made in different countries in the world. I saw women working at wet linen looms, a stream of water pouring on the fabric as they wove it, and their clothing wet from their hips to their feet, and standing with bare feet on the wet floors, working for $2.50 a week.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. No; I will not yield now. I will by and by.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I was going to say that I had seen that same thing in this country.

Mr. HILL. I know you do not like these things. I am not giving them to you to like. I am making this speech for the country, and not for you.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I simply wanted to tell you that I saw that very condition in this country.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut declines to yield.

Mr. HILL. I went into every department of that establishment. I saw them hackling flax. They took the fiber and threw it over great iron hooks and drew it out and straightened it, breathing the dust constantly into the nostrils and lungs. It is a dangerous occupation. It is a tremendously fatiguing occupation. How much do you suppose those men got for that kind of work? Three and a half dollars a week. You say this was rough, cheap work of which I have spoken. One day I stopped at Brussels and went to the Royal Lace Factory. At this lace factory there were two women clerks. It was early in the morning and the manager had not come. I tried to buy a lace collar for friends at home. I looked first at one and then at another, and finally I found one that I wanted. It had taken the first prize at the Paris Exposition. I bought it and paid for it, and I paid the duty on it when I got here, too. [Laughter.]

As I came down to the door one of the clerks followed me, and just then the lady manager of the establishment came in. The clerk told her what I had bought. The manager turned to me and said, "Sir, you need not be afraid of that piece of lace ever being duplicated." I said, "Why not?" She said, "The woman that made that lace worked on it for two years, went blind, and has since died." I said, "How much did you pay her?" She turned to me and said, "Twenty cents a day." I was sorry that I had bought it. I have bought lace in factories in Venice where they told me that 5,000 girls were working for 12 and 18 cents a day. You can not find that in New England; but you may find it if you pass this bill and pursue to the end this policy on which you have started. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Talking about iron and steel, I have seen mechanics in Japan, in Yokohama, in foundries making corework, first-class molders. What do we pay them here? Three or four dollars a day.

A MEMBER. Five dollars a day.

Mr. HILL. I have seen first-class corework castings being made in Japan from Japanese or Chinese iron, and the men got 40 cents a day. When I was in Osaka I was told that there were 40 cotton mills running there day and night with a double shift, and the girls were earning 8 cents and the men 15 cents a day. You propose to open the markets of the United States to products of that kind of labor. [Applause on the Republican side.] The American people will not sustain you in it.

I have seen that sort of thing all over the world. Even the free traders of England would not sustain a policy of that kind. Three years ago I was going through a large factory in England, and the manager said to me: "I suppose, coming from America, you are a protectionist?" I said: "I am. Are you?" He said: "No; but I should be if I lived in the United States." [Applause on the Republican side.] That is what England thinks of you.

I will not go on with this. I have statistics made up by myself in the last 16 years. Almost every long vacation I have visited some country in the world. In 1896 I started from the north of Ireland and went through to Italy, visiting factories. I have seen men in the porcelain works at Sevres, France, working for from 60 cents to $1.40 a day. I have seen men in the Gobelin tapestry works making fabrics fit for a king's ransom, with a picture on the wall behind them and the hand loom in front of them. Occasionally the man would look behind him, but he would reproduce in the fabric in the loom every line and color in that magnificent picture. There is no work in the world that will compare with it; and they were getting from $7.50 to $15 a week. Think of it! You can see such things as these in most of the Old World countries. I have seen them in Palestine, Egypt, Servia, Turkey, China, Japan, and all over the world. I can hire a man in Siberia at $50 a year and in Japan for $10 a year.

I will not go into this any further. I want to give you my parting thought. Whatever you do, do quickly. It may not seem of consequence to you, but it is of immense consequence to 90,000,000 people. The business of the country is stagnant awaiting your action. The pending measure, crudely drawn, uncertain in its phraseology, destructive of revenue, transferring whole industries to foreign countries, tending inevitably to idle mills, unemployed workmen, and general reductions of wages, has not thus far met any enthusiastic response, even from the men who placed you in power last fall, to say nothing of those who, believing in the protective principle wisely administered, prophesied that you would attempt to destroy it. Day after day the country is warned by the advocates of this measure that this is but the beginning. And it is unblushingly admitted to be a piece of favoritism to a particular class. Where is it to end? And what becomes of the fundamental principle of the Democratic platform declarations for a tariff for revenue only and the Jeffersonian doctrine of "equal rights to all and special privilege to none"—not even the farmers?

Have you abandoned your principles at the very outset, and is the power of taxation to be exercised by you in the future as a system of political rewards and punishments? If so, you should not forget that the same people who judged us will in the future judge you, and that the condemnation which will come to you from your betrayal of their confidence will be swift and certain. [Prolonged applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STONE].

Mr. STONE. Mr. Chairman, there is a story of a boy who visited a circus with his father. In the course of the program a man was shot from a cannon. He landed some distance away and was immediately pounced upon by several clowns, who began to strike him on the head with clubs. Turning to his father the boy asked why, if the man was dead, it was necessary to knock him on the head. The reply was, "That is to make him deader."

This measure has been advocated with rare eloquence and force during the past 10 days by the able leaders on this side, and in rising now to address the committee on some general phases of this tariff measure I can not hope to do more than kill the opposition "deader."

Even if the opposition has not all been killed, we have the consolation of the words found in II Kings, vi, 16:

> Fear not, for they that be with us are more than they that be with them.

It might seem presumptuous in me, one of the youngest Members of this body, to join in this debate were it not for the fact that there is no American citizen whose influence is not as a member of the body politic necessary to its well-being. In this Republic no one need imagine himself too weak, too poor, or too insignificant to do a part.

The humblest citizen in this great Republic may rejoice as being a coworker with him who is the highest, assured that without fidelity on his part the efforts of others will lose something of their value, and sure that he equally with them is a part of this Nation and a maker of its destiny.

Mindful of the great responsibility that devolves upon me as one of the number who are charged with the important duty of legislating for 92,000,000 people, I rise to urge the passage of this bill.

There are those who profess to view its enactment into law with forebodings of disaster. I have been amused rather than worried by the suggestions of those who view with alarm this effort at reform. Their attacks have been most unfair in what they concealed, and entirely false as to much that they asserted. This bill may produce fear in the hearts of the few who oppress, but it will give hope to the many who are oppressed.

The people have been aroused to the need of tariff reform, and they will not yield in their demands because of dire prophecies on the part of some gentlemen of stand-pat tendencies of calamitous projects concealed beneath the harmless surface of this bill.

Under the awakened conscience and intelligent attention of the people, the person or the party will be sustained that undertakes to check this slavery of the many to the avarice of the few.

It is almost beyond belief that the people of the United States, in the very center of the most productive region of the globe and in the midst of splendid harvests, amply furnished with transportation facilities, free from pestilence, and full of energy and vigor are held up daily by trade combinations fostered by a monstrous tariff law which forces them to pay unprecedented prices for the necessaries of life. Yet the household bills of every family in the Union give full and direct testimony that this is the case. It is high time that the food supplies of our people be freed from the control of these combinations, which are paralyzing the industrial population of the country and threatening the peace and prosperity of all classes through their avaricious exactions.

Any proposition to remedy this condition is met with the charge that it is fraught with disaster to the business interests of the country, and is to be prevented by all means. The beneficiaries of high protective duties wish the people to believe that prosperity is not the result of laws operating naturally; that it does not come from the application of intelligence and industry to the resources of the earth, but that it is the artificial creation of a taxing device. They would argue that the United States has not achieved its great growth by virtue of its inheritance of fertile lands, rich mines, and noble forests, and by the industry and integrity of its people, but because the Government permits a monopoly tariff that takes from one class and gives to another class. Any talk of change in the slightest detail of this magic device for the production of prosperity is branded as sacrilegious and sure to bring down punishment upon both the just and the unjust. The friends of the system contend that any fluctuation in prices is not due to economic causes like overproduction, speculation, undue expansion, and the natural operation of supply and demand, but to a profane questioning of the infallibility of this high-protective tariff idol which has provoked his anger and brought down his wrath.

The fact that this system enables the privileged few to accumulate vast wealth is considered by its friends as sufficient justification for its establishment and as sufficient reason for its continuance. This conclusion can be based only on the assumption that a great fortune justifies itself, no matter how it is made. These persons seemingly fail to see that those who buy—the consumers—have anything to do with the question. If a certain business is making money and the workmen have labor throughout the year, all should be well with the world. When these workmen rise against the conditions which the avarice of their employers has imposed, we form organizations of relief, but we allow the system which produced the unjust conditions to continue unabated.

The world has moved, but it is a regrettable confession that in a legislative way we are still acting under the old belief that to be prosperous we must in some way rob our neighbors.

No sensible person fights wealth as such, but everyone should oppose the privileges that produce swollen fortunes on the one hand and undeserved poverty on the other. Surely the prosperity of one should be consistent with the welfare of all, and one man can not be allowed to have more than he should have without forcing some other man to accept less than he should have. We may dazzle the world by our trade statistics and bewilder the nations with our marvelous prosperity, but we must do something finer and nobler than this to justify our large claims to leadership among the nations of the world. We must stand for honesty and justice. No amount of argument will prove that many of the schedules of the present tariff law are honest and just. It enables the trusts and monopolies to exact extortionate profits and to thus increase the cost of living beyond all reasonable bounds. No reduction in tariff rates is contemplated that will injure American labor or cripple American industry. An honest and just revision is all that the people demand, but they will be satisfied with nothing less. The important fact about the present tariff as the people see it is that it is unjust and dishonest, written by the servants of special privileges for the benefit of their masters, and intended not to help the small man make a living but to help the big man make an exorbitant profit. It is no justification of such a tariff to refer to its alleged virtues as a revenue producer. This Government is not reduced to the necessity of raising its revenues by schedules which rob the people. The present tariff pays the Government about $330,000,000 a year, but it enables the trusts and monopolies to increase their profits to the extent of $4,000,000,000 a year.

The 1910 Illinois State Democratic platform contains this plank, and it expresses my sentiments and voices my policy:

> We denounce the Payne-Aldrich Tariff Act as an indefensible masterpiece of injustice, legally authorizing remorseless extortions from the many to enrich the few through the operations of trusts and monopolies, which it fosters. Tariff taxation, like other taxation, should be so levied as not to discriminate against nor in favor of any section, class, industry, or corporation, and should be limited to the actual necessities of government honestly and economically administered.
> We insist that any law enacted with the intention of enabling individuals or corporations to levy tribute upon the American people, or to guarantee a "reasonable profit" to any class, is in violation of the Constitution of the United States and is indefensible from either a legal or a moral standpoint.

Not only does a high protective tariff bear down upon the masses of our people with a cruel and uneven hand, but it is a fruitful source of corruption. The widespread corruption which has caused the defilement of our politics did not have its origin in politics, although it finds expression and quakes publicity there. Its source is in the greed of men who, to secure tariff legislation that would give them personal advantage and add to their wealth, have stooped to bribery and the corrupt manipulation of public functionaries. The hideous power of privilege not only permeates and taints politics, but its impure hands soil the very fountains of justice. The astonishing feature of the situation is that an intelligent people have so long viewed with indifference, and in some cases even openly applauded, the men who are shrewd enough to manipulate politics to their own gain. The people have so long permitted our Government to be used for the speculative purposes of men who shamelessly debauch our public representatives that all the foreign critics dwell upon our civic degradation. Our robes must again be washed pure and white and no longer allowed to trail in the dust of this dishonor and infamy. The evil of corruption can be eradicated just as surely as wrong can be overcome by right. A redemptive war is necessary to our national existence and is sure to be won, but it will require the same high quality of patriotism as when the war drums beat and the bugles play and men go forth to battle. The honor and dignity of our great legislative bodies must be restored and the present views of foreign critics as to the sordidness of our civilization must be removed. No hypercritical obstacles should prevent this reformation, which, it must be conceded, is a consummation devoutly to be wished. The enlightened sentiment of the American people will no longer tolerate a tariff law that, by reason of the special favors it grants, leads the recipients of those special favors to debauch our electorate in order to procure its continuance.

This objectionable tariff system has heretofore been shielded behind the cloak of partisan politics, and there are those who now seek to frustrate this step toward reform by attempting to brand it as a purely partisan affair. Simple justice should never bear the stamp of partisanship.

It has been very gratifying to me to observe the scant regard for party lines in the votes upon the several measures that have already passed this House. I trust that the vote on this measure will be a further indication of the same wholesome spirit. There is an independent spirit now in evidence over the country, and it is not allied with the reactionary forces but with the forces that upbuild and uplift. Each Representative must measure up to his opportunities and convince the people of what he can do for them or he can not expect their continued confidence nor their future support. Their allegiance is to the truth and not to the man nor the party who assumes to represent the truth, but who does little to promote progress in the way of better things.

A genuine interest in popular government and the spread of progressive ideas have brought about a weakening of party ties. Hereafter political success will depend more upon merit and less upon traditional prejudices. The time of slavish adherence to party names has passed into history. Corruption never has paid any attention to party lines; honesty and decency have ceased to pay attention to party lines in order that they might triumph. With the people it is no longer a question of what is regular, but of what is right.

In order to enhance its chances of favorable consideration by the other branch of Congress and to insure its approval by the President, I should like to see this bill get a large independent vote here. I would not deny to any Republican of whatever variety the privilege to vote for this measure, and I would gladly share with all such persons the credit that is rightly due to those who secure its passage. The interests of the people transcend all questions of personal or party advantage. This should not be a party measure as party lines are now drawn. It is the people's question, and the people are sure to visit their resentment upon the person or the party who fails or refuses to apply the remedy. Tariff reduction has been demanded by the people in tones loud enough to be heard throughout the land, and the demand will not cease until it is accomplished. This demand is not only loud and deep and universal, but it is right and just and must prevail.

The fact that this particular bill is planned primarily to relieve the farmers of unjust burdens does not justify its classification by its opponents as class legislation. The blood and the brains of every vocation of life are perennially supplied by drafts upon the farming population of the country. Most of the greatest men and women of our history were born and reared on the farm. The farm has developed the potential energy and inspired the latent genius of those who are now our leaders in practically all the professions of life. We may confidently expect that in the future it will furnish the majority of those who are destined by native force of character to create the great fortunes and to wield the mighty influences of the country. We can not benefit the farmer without indirectly benefiting all classes, for upon his welfare rests the welfare of all our people.

Again, there are those who claim this bill is sectional in its character and appeal to an ancient prejudice in their efforts to encompass its defeat. No longer will that Circe's voice enable them to keep fastened upon us a system that is opposed in purpose and spirit to every principle of independence and liberty upheld by the general sentiment of the people of this country.

There is a North of waving fields and blossoming meadows and verdant pastures, with untold wealth of mine and orchard and field.

There is a great awakening South covered with billowy waves of snowy cotton, whose annual crop would buy a kingdom.

There is an East with its ambitions and its wonderful factories.

There is a West with its vast prairies and inexhaustible mines.

But these sections have all been fused as in the furnace of some great Vulcan and welded with an Odin's mighty hammer of patriotism until there is neither seam nor flaw.

There is a North, a South, an East, and a West, but they are all parts of a united and stupendous whole. The men of the North and the men of the South cherish the same sentiments of liberty, glory in the same common memories, and love the same old striped and starry banner which is the scarred and priceless legacy of a thousand battle fields.

On a hillside in Kentucky in a section of country far removed from railroads and telegraphs and the quickening touch of commerce is a vine-covered mound in a little churchyard. Within it lies the remains of a man wrapped in the Stars and Stripes, whose body was riddled with bullets at El Caney. His neighbors called him a hero, and on his tomb they have written: "Here lies the son of a Confederate soldier. He died for his country." And there is to-day no one to say nay. Forty years ago that inscription would have been erased by a million hands in contempt, but to-day no hand would be so vandal and blasphemous as to chisel out one letter. A mighty change has swept over this country of ours in four decades, a change that has betrayed itself not only in the face of nature but in the lives of the people. A new people has sprung up, a new set of conditions, a new civilization, a new patriotism, new in that it is one, from ocean to ocean, north to south; a united people, united in a common bond of commercial interest, of national ambition, and of brotherly sympathy.

The great army commanded by the Duke of Wellington was made up of regiments from all parts of the British Empire. When in camp, as with most armies, the evenings were frequently spent in singing.

Beginning with the Scottish regiments, they would sing:

Scots wha hae wi' Wallace bled,
Scots, wham Bruce has often led,
Welcome to your gory bed,
Or to glorious victorie.

Then the Irish or the Welsh regiments would follow each with their favorite song, and so on until the English squares were reached when they would start "God Save the King." At once the soldiers from all parts of the United Kingdom would join in until the whole great army as with one mighty voice was singing "God Save the King."

As representatives of the various districts and States of this Union, we will each have our heritage of local traditions and local problems, but we should stand here as Americans to glory in the triumphs and be happy in the accomplishments of one great inseparable country. We should be animated by a spirit of lofty patriotism which knows no section, no race, no sect, nor creed, and which is filled with a holy enthusiasm for the welfare of all the people, so that America may continue to draw the world unto her until her ideals shall everywhere prevail.

The words of Patrick Henry to the First Continental Congress are in a larger sense than then true to-day:

The distinction between Virginians, Pennsylvanians, and New Yorkers is no more. I am not a Virginian but an American.

Despite the efforts of the few who express and appeal to a contrary sentiment, a united America calmly and hopefully looks forth upon the world. This bill is a manifestation of that spirit of fraternity which blesses our land and treats each and every section with equal favor.

We have adopted rules that allow the maximum freedom of debate, and by making the committees elective instead of appointive the Speaker can no longer pack committees in order to block the will of the Nation and then enforce his decrees with the political death of those of his own party who oppose him.

We have voted in favor of a constitutional amendment to provide for the direct election of Senators which is calculated to make the other body of Congress more responsive to the will of the people. We have passed a bill that requires the publication of campaign funds before as well as after the election for the purpose of making every election an expression of the virtue and intelligence of the people. We have passed the measure to provide reciprocal trade relations with Canada, thereby cementing together the two great English-speaking nations in the bonds of peace, friendship, and commerce. All these things will meet the approval of the manhood and conscience of the citizenship of this Nation. Let us now pass this farmers' free-list bill and still further deserve the approval and commendation of the people.

Upon each of us rests a responsible duty to perform, which we must not shirk or give only a half-hearted attention.

The forces of the people and the forces of privilege are lined up in battle form to-day. Our integrity and destiny as a nation depend on the outcome. The people of the United States expect every Representative to do his duty to-day.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ALEXANDER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 4413, the free-list bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

SWEARING IN OF A MEMBER.

Mr. REDFIELD appeared at the bar of the House and took the oath of office.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—JAMES MORAN.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to Mr. JACKSON to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of James Moran, Sixtieth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTIONS SIGNED.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolutions of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. J. Res. 38. Joint resolution to grant authority to the American Red Cross to erect temporary structures in Potomac Park, Washington, D. C.

H. J. Res. 3. Joint resolution making immediately available the appropriations for mileage of Senators and Members of the House of Representatives.

CLOSING GENERAL DEBATE.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate on the bill H. R. 4413—the free-list bill—be closed when the House adjourn on Saturday next.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that general debate on the pending bill be closed when the House adjourns on Saturday next. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the gentleman that he also ask that the House meet at 12 o'clock on Monday instead of at 11 o'clock.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I will ask that after this request is granted.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, Mr. Speaker, the present order of the House is that it shall meet at 11 o'clock until this bill is disposed of. I ask unanimous consent that the hour for meeting on Monday next and thereafter shall be at 12 o'clock instead of 11.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ADJOURNMENT.

Then, on motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD (at 5 o'clock and 8 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned to meet on Friday, May 5, 1911, at 11 o'clock a. m.

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to send to the House of Representatives full information, as follows, with regard to certain statements made by Hon. ROBERT E. DIFENDERFER, of Pennsylvania, in the House on April 25, 1911:

First. What proportion of the contracts for Army shoes during the fiscal years 1909, 1910, and 1911 were awarded to the firm of Hermann & Co.?

Second. What are the names of the individuals or firms who have secured contracts for Army shoes in the fiscal years 1909, 1910, and 1911? What was the amount of each contract?

Third. Have any competitors been blacklisted or disqualified from bidding on any Army shoe contract in the fiscal years 1909, 1910, and 1911? If so, what were the names of those competitors and what was the cause of their disqualification?

Fourth. What proportion of the Army shoe contracts in the fiscal years 1909, 1910, and 1911 were awarded to the lowest bidders?

Fifth. How many bidders were there for the last Army shoe contract?

Sixth. Is Shrewsbury leather required in the specifications for Army shoes?

Seventh. Did the War Department institute a test between Shrewsbury leather and Calumet leather? If so, was it found that Calumet leather was better?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to reserve points of order until I can make an inquiry. I would like to ask the gentleman when this resolution was introduced.

The SPEAKER. April 27.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Has it been 10 days——

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Eight days.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that I have not had a chance to investigate this question or find out why the committee have not reported the resolution. In the temporary absence of the chairman of the committee from the House, if the gentleman presses his motion at this time, I will be compelled to move to lay the matter on the table.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent of the House, as this question is not debatable and the gentleman from Alabama is only proceeding with my consent, that I have 10 minutes to make a statement. If not, I shall be obliged to have a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent for 10 minutes in which to make a statement——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Without affecting the parliamentary situation.

The SPEAKER. Without affecting the parliamentary situation——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no objection.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I think the gentleman will see that it comes under the seven-day rule.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the gentleman from Massachusetts has 10 minutes.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, a similar resolution was passed the other day with regard to the Navy Department. This is somewhat a peculiar matter, Mr. Speaker. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DIFENDERFER] has himself subsequently introduced a resolution carrying practically the same language—if I may have the attention of the gentleman from Alabama—covering exactly the same question. I am willing, if there is no objection, to offer his resolution as a substitute for mine, with certain amendments. The gentleman from Pennsylvania stated the other day that the firm of Hermann & Co. absolutely control shoes manufactured in this country for the Army and Navy. He says:

> Is not it a fact Hermann & Co. absolutely control, after freezing out every other competitor in the United States, the manufacture of shoes for the Army and Navy of the United States?

He states that this is done by putting in the specifications a requirement for the use of Shrewsbury leather, certain specifications, and he says the War Department tried Shrewsbury leather and Calumet leather and found Calumet leather was the best, but still would not take it.

He states that this firm of Hermann & Co. had used their influence with Government representatives to freeze out and place other people on the blacklist.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am aware that the permanent RECORD does not show that the gentleman says that these people, Hermann & Co., had absolute control, but I hold the original reporter's notes in my hand. As soon as I found that his remarks had been changed by the insertion of the word "had," so as to make it past instead of present, I changed my resolution so as to cover three years. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DIFENDERFER] now proposes to cover 10 years in the investigation, and I am quite content.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, which I am willing to substitute for my own, should be amended by putting in the words "Shrewsbury leather," which he stated was inserted in Army specifications, and that by such insertion the firm of Hermann & Co. secured our Army shoe contracts. My resolution also contains an inquiry with regard to this test which he alleges was made.

Now, I do not suppose that there is any man on that side of the House, especially any of the older Members, who seriously believes for a moment that the Army officers who look after our shoe contracts are crooks. I do not suppose that there is anything going to be found out by that resolution, but I give notice right here and now, since the days of investigations have begun, that anonymous investigations are not going to be made, and a gentleman who rises on the floor of this House can not take away the character of reputable shoemakers without having somebody say "Prove your words." And therefore I shall offer, Mr. Speaker, if the question of consideration is carried, to amend the resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania so as to conform with the statement which he made on the floor of the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER], inasmuch as this is new matter to me and I have not investigated it, what the amendment is which he proposes to offer to the resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DIFENDERFER].

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DIFENDERFER] stated that this firm of Hermann & Co. had corraled Shrewsbury leather; that Shrewsbury leather was included in the Army specifications, and that is the way the thing was done. Now, his resolution, different from mine, reads this way:

> Fifth. Whether any of the specifications for such Army shoe contracts in any fiscal year since 1901 stipulated any particular make of leather? If so, what?

I move to insert:

> Shrewsbury leather or—

In order to accentuate this question. I believe everybody knows that the Army officers are not guilty, but I want the gentleman to prove his words. So I propose to put in this:

> Seventh. Did the War Department institute a test between Shrewsbury leather and Calumet leather? If so, was it found that Calumet leather was better?

I have simply taken the statement the gentleman made on the floor of this House and want to ask that question. Otherwise I will substitute his resolution in full.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, Mr. Speaker, if I may have unanimous consent, I would like to make a statement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent——

Mr. MANN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker. What reason is there for the gentleman asking unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. He asked unanimous consent.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. A motion to discharge a committee from the consideration of a resolution of inquiry must be decided without debate. The question before the House is the question of discharging a committee.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, the motion of the gentleman is to discharge the committee from the further consideration of this resolution. Now, I understand that the Committee on Military Affairs has this resolution under consideration; that they are actually considering it; that they have appointed a subcommittee to make investigations and report back to the full committee. I have no doubt, from the information I have before me, or from what I have heard, that that report will come in at a date in the near future. I think the very statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] shows that this resolution ought to be considered by a committee, and the language properly drafted and reported to the House, so that it can properly be passed on. Therefore I do not think that the committee ought to be discharged at this time, and for that reason I hope that the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts will be voted down.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. One moment, if the gentleman will yield.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Has the gentleman received information that it is the intention of the committee to report that resolution?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. My information came from the chairman of the committee. I recall it now, although I did not remember it when the question first came up. My information is that this resolution is being investigated by the committee, and, as I understand, a subcommittee has been appointed to look into the matter and report back to the full committee.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. In that case, Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my motion, or resolution, to discharge the committee.

APPROPRIATIONS INCIDENT TO THE SESSION.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have laid before the House the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 2) making appropriations for the payment of certain expenses incident to the first session of the Sixty-second Congress, with Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to move concurrence in the Senate amendments.

These amendments, Mr. Speaker, relate particularly to the organization of the Senate itself. They first provide for certain employees essential to the transaction of the business of the Senate. The House provided for its session employees in the original resolution.

The second amendment of the Senate provides an appropriation of a thousand dollars for stationery for the committees of the Senate.

Another amendment takes care of a situation arising because of the death of a person named to do a particular work. Mr. Pitman Pulsifer had been designated in the legislative act, as I recall, or the deficiency bill, one or the other, as the person to prepare the Navy Yearbook and to supervise certain indexing work that had been put in his charge. He has died. The law provides that the Navy Yearbook should be issued annually, and a large amount of the indexing is still to be done. The Senate desires, instead of designating at this time some person permanently for the performance of the work, to reserve the control over the designation of the persons to do the work in the Committee of the Appropriations of the Senate; and inasmuch as it is a matter that peculiarly affects the work of the Senate and makes no additional appropriation, it seems to me, the House should not attempt to interfere with them in the control of that work.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Pitman Pulsifer was formerly the clerk to the Committee on Naval Affairs in the Senate, of which the gentleman from Maine, Senator Hale, was chairman. Senator Hale, as will be remembered, was afterwards made chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate. Mr. Pitman Pulsifer, while serving under Senator Hale as clerk to the Committee on Naval Affairs, became very expert in reference to naval affairs, and it was provided that he should compile the Navy Yearbook and index certain Senate public documents. That work was originated only a very short time ago. Afterwards it was provided that he should index various Senate public documents and also reports and hearings of Senate committees and joint committees of the House and Senate. Now he has died. Just why it should be left to the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate to employ somebody to compile the Navy Yearbook I am not informed. The Committee on Appropriations of the Senate has nothing to do with the Navy, and certainly has no more to do with it than the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], presiding over the Committee on Appropriations of the House.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The reason given by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations in the Senate was this: Not only was Mr. Pulsifer appointed as indexer, but some gentleman, whose name I do not recall at the moment, was appointed as his assistant. This fund of $6,000 was utilized to a great extent for indexing the reports of the Immigration Commission, the persons doing the work being considered particularly familiar with it and fitted for the performance of that work.

It is believed that the gentleman who has been engaged in this work, not only under Mr. Pulsifer but since his death, may prove entirely satisfactory. The statement is made that before any permanent designation is made it would be better to utilize the appropriations heretofore made under the control of the committee in the Senate until it is determined who is best fitted to do the work; and the control of this matter having been assumed by the Senate, and as Senate employees are at present engaged in the work, there is no disposition at this time, so far as I know, to interfere with the Senate control of it.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] does not need any protection from this side of the House, but I can not see why, in the compilation of the Naval Yearbook, the disposition of funds should be left to the control of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate, which has nothing to do with the Naval Yearbook. I can see why Pitman Pulsifer was provided for by special appropriation, because he had been the clerk of the Committee on Naval Affairs and the right-hand man of Senator Hale when he was at the head of that committee, and also when he became head of the Committee on Appropriations; but if the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] is willing to let the Senate succeed to his powers, I shall not object at this time, although if this item should come in in a regular appropriation bill, I think decidedly that the objection should be made.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman is no doubt aware that the Naval Yearbook originated with Mr. Pulsifer when he was clerk of the Senate committee.

Mr. MANN. But Mr. Pulsifer is no longer here.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is true. Apparently, whoever might have been interested properly in that matter in the House was absolutely indifferent to it. Provision heretofore had been made in the Senate that Mr. Pulsifer should not only edit the Naval Yearbook but should do this other indexing work. There might be a controversy in the Senate as to whether the Committee on Appropriations or the Committee on Naval Affairs should have control of the matter, but the Senator who is chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs—the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS]—ranks next to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations in the Senate.

Mr. MANN. In the Senate, but that situation does not exist in the House.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Quite true; but the Senate orginated a very valuable and useful work. Members of the House in preceding Congresses who might properly have been interested in protecting their right to participate in it seem to have been indifferent to the matter.

Mr. MANN. Oh, not at all. Everybody at both ends of the Capitol, I think, conceded that Mr. Pulsifer was peculiarly qualified to perform that work; but he is not living. Who will be selected by the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate to compile this work now, which is just as valuable to the House as it is to the Senate, the gentleman may know and the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate may know, but I do not know.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Committee on Appropriations of the Senate made the statement that the gentleman who was acting as Mr. Pulsifer's assistant is now in charge of the work; but before a permanent designation is made, they wish to ascertain the character of the work that may be done under him.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman informed whether that is a brother of Mr. Pitman Pulsifer?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; it is not. I do not recall the name of the gentleman, but it is not Mr. Pitman Pulsifer's brother.

Mr. MANN. I say that because Mr. Pitman Pulsifer's brother is a very capable man for that kind of work, I should say.

Mr. FITZGERALD. He is a very competent man, but he has been for a great many years clerk of the Committee on Commerce of the Senate, engaged in an entirely different line of work.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Ought not this to be done jointly by the Naval Committees of the House and Senate?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Probably it should.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. By the Naval Committees of the House and Senate instead of the Appropriations Committee of the Senate?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The work has been done by certain employees of the Senate. The money was appropriated and one person was named as the law; and simply for the purpose of utilizing the appropriations already made and to continue the work, instead of attempting to designate some individual permanently. This puts it under the control of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate. For the present I see no objection to it.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. It would seem that it ought to be under the control of the Senate and House Naval Committees, and that it ought not to be under the control of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not certain that it should be done by either House.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman will give consideration to the suggestions made by my colleague and myself when it comes to consider the regular appropriation bill or any Senate amendment to it that seems to allow the Senate to take to itself additional patronage to do work that ought to be controlled by both House and Senate.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The difficulty about it would be that both Houses would be claiming patronage, and would result in increased expenditure to do the same amount of work.

Mr. MANN. I am sorry to hear the gentleman say that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. In the interest of economy, I should prefer to let the Senate do the work, rather than to multiply expense.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do.

Mr. BARTLETT. There are several similar places which the House provided for by resolution for work of this identical character. Indexing and things of that sort have been provided for by simple resolution of the House, and the resolution carried from year to year. The gentleman connected with war claims has for years been carried on an appropriation bill, or by resolution passed solely by the House, naming him in it, for the purpose of classifying and keeping up the index of claims growing out of the recent war.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And the Senate has never attempted to designate the person to do that work.

Mr. BARTLETT. I think there are many things the Senate provides for that might be dispensed with, and I do not know but that this is one. However, I am glad the attention of the House and the Committee on Appropriations has been called to it, and if it is unnecessary, when we come to frame the appropriation bill, I think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] can rest assured that if we can prevent it, if it is determined to be unnecessary, it will not be appropriated for hereafter. I am speaking for myself and not for the committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves that the House concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. MANN. I understood the gentleman from New York to ask unanimous consent.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have asked unanimous consent, and, of course, I understand this is not a privileged matter. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Speaker lay before the House the joint resolution and Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the Chair lay before the House the Senate amendments to this resolution. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I move that the House concur in the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, they will be voted for en gross.

There was no demand for a separate vote.

The question was taken, and the Senate amendments were agreed to.

On motion of Mr. FITZGERALD, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the Senate amendments were agreed to was laid on the table.

THE TARIFF.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 4413, to place agricultural implements and other articles on the free list.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. ALEXANDER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4413) to place on the free list agricultural implements, cotton bagging, cotton ties, leather, boots and shoes, fence wire, meats, cereals, flour, bread, timber, lumber, sewing machines, salt, and other articles.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WILDER].

Mr. WILDER. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this so-called farmers' free-list bill. With reference to the oft-repeated statement by Members of this body, that it was the greatest deliberative body on earth, and the natural disinclination of anyone to dispute it who is a Member thereof, the certain fact seems to be that it represents 92,000,000 people and the country is the greatest ever, and whether or not the body was great it is incumbent upon it, either by its inherent greatness or, if necessary, borrowed greatness, to try to square itself with the needs of the situation.

It is acknowledged that this country has more wealth than England and France combined and that its problems must be correspondingly great, and it behooves us to be liberal in reference to matters pertaining to the greatness of the country and economical in matters pertaining to waste.

I disclaim any great knowledge of the workings of this body, excepting as it has been observed from the outside for 25 years, together with a pretty close observation inside since being a Member, but wish to couple this with the claim of some knowledge of the affairs on the outside of this great body with which it has to deal and will treat largely from this standpoint, observing that the treatment will be confined mostly to the general situation and almost entirely with acknowledged facts and the deductions largely those which can be drawn therefrom, with something of an illustration along the lines that the specific must always yield to the general, for facts as recorded by history represent a summing up of the whole or, in other words, a balance sheet, and in order to understand the specific it must be read into this general summing up of the whole.

The fourth Massachusetts district, which I have the honor to represent, has few, if any, equals by way of the variety of interests or activities therein. It consists of 44 cities and towns; in about 14 of them is much manufacturing of a wide range of production. The other 30 towns are largely farming, with incidental manufacturing only. On the east are the historic towns of Concord and Lexington, with their minute men and guns, and the great watch city of Waltham. Doubtless many of you have Waltham watches in your pockets. There are then the big shoe towns of Marlboro, Hudson, Framingham, Natick, and others. I have no doubt many of you have on shoes made in some of these towns. There are the big woolen mills at Maynard; at Clinton are the mammoth Bigelow carpet mills. Carpets from these mills may be in some of your homes. The big Lancaster cotton mills are also there and a big wire industry. Leominster is the big comb town; few of you probably who have not at some time or other used a comb made in Leominster. Next Fitchburg, with its big paper mills, making the paper for both the Ladies' Home Journal and the Saturday Evening Post, its big Parkhill cotton mills, together with a large woolen and yarn industry. Besides this, steam engines and the big Dillon boiler works and many other smaller factories. There is scarcely one here, probably, who has not seen or used some of the goods made at Fitchburg. Last, but not least, is my home town of Gardner, undoubtedly the greatest chair locality in the world. Other large industries too numerous to mention are in the district. Quantities of cotton from the South; wool, leather, and lumber from the West; steel and iron from Pennsylvania and other districts, are consumed by its manufactories, which they in turn ship all over the country. The man who represents this district can not go far astray if he stands true to such a constituency. If he sees things as they are, he must cut a pretty straight track and act with fairness and firmness or he will have troubles too numerous to mention. Yet it is a grand old district.

When an expert is called to testify on the stand he is expected to qualify, but I have not time to go into the details of the various interests with which I am quite closely acquainted and with many of which in times past I have been and am still identified. I will simply state that I was brought up on a farm as a boy and still own and operate a farm of 250 acres. I have employed men since I was 17 years old. I went to manufacturing in 1884 and have exported and imported goods since that time. During the early days of the McKinley Act, among other articles, we were importing thousands of boxes of tinplate, about which I might state some interesting things, but time will not allow. I am still connected with quite a few manufacturing industries of various kinds and know the business from beginning to end. Incidentally, I am a member of the bar.

This bill before us seems to be known as the farmers' free list, ostensibly made for the relief of the farmer, although it appears to be limited to the class of farmers whom it is intended to relieve. And in passing I wish to refer to a matter which I may refer to again and which I have previously mentioned; that is, the thousands of bales of cotton from the South used by our many cotton mills—that beautiful Southland that anyone who has seen must love—and refer to the blessings that have been so bountifully bestowed upon her in the past few years, and it is passing strange, it is beyond anything I can imagine or think why it is, that the representatives of these people to-day should still be complaining of our tariff, and anything else for that matter, when they have been so bountifully and abundantly favored in the past five years. Cotton to-day is quoted at about 15 cents a pound. During the time of the famous—perhaps I might say infamous—Wilson bill, labeled by the late President Cleveland a piece of "perfidy and dishonor," the price of cotton was about 9 cents per pound.

Complaint is made now of the alleged robbing of the cotton-producing States because of a duty on cotton bagging and ties. I shall not go into the details of this, but simply call attention to the fact that an average bale of 500 pounds of cotton is worth to-day about $75, the total cost of the bagging and ties covering the bale is about $1 per bale, or about 1⅓ per cent. If the whole business could be saved and the North could give the South its packages, this per cent represents the limit of saving. At the close of the last Democratic administration the same average bale of cotton was worth about $45 and the bagging and ties cost about $1 per bale, representing over 2 per cent on the cost. Notice this is at the close of the last Democratic administration. Assuming that this is now a Democratic administration, at least in this House, and I am talking with relation to their activities, which does the Southland like better, Republican cotton conditions or Democratic cotton conditions? I do not know what might be saved if bagging and ties were free, nor is it material if 15-cent cotton can be continued, but how much of this state of affairs did the cotton-producing States bring about? They are comparatively small consumers of their cotton. On the other hand, they are comparatively small consumers of the manufactured goods of the northern factories. There is already much of this tainted northern money invested in the South, even in cotton mills. What recompense do the cotton-producing States give to the rest of the country for this magnificent price of this Republican administration they are receiving for their cotton brought about only under Republican conditions? There is no other crop raised in this country so favored. By so favored I mean in a worse condition at the close of the last Democratic administration and in better condition at the close of a Republican administration. If this argues for a change in the management of this great country I am utterly devoid of the powers of reasoning.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. WILDER. I do.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman state what the price of cotton was during the first year or two of the McKinley administration?

Mr. WILDER. I can not tell the gentleman.

Mr. BARTLETT. It was lower than it ever was in the history of the country except one year.

Mr. WILDER. I am taking the general conditions of the last Democratic administration and comparing them with the last 14 years of Republican administration on the item of cotton.

Mr. BARTLETT. What is the tariff on raw cotton that makes the tariff affect cotton?

Mr. WILDER. I have not gone into the details. I have said that in matters of great concern the details must yield to the general. Mahomet must come to the mountain and not the mountain to Mahomet. In those years of Democratic administration cotton was 9 cents, and it is now 15 cents a pound.

Mr. BARTLETT. Might I ask another question? The gentleman said that the South consumed only a small portion of the raw product of the cotton crop. Is it not a fact that for the past two years the South has consumed more of its raw product than the other mills in the country?

Mr. WILDER. I do not understand the question.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman says the South consumed in its factories only a small portion of the cotton crop. I ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that the mills of the South last year and the year before consumed more of the raw product in its factories than the eastern mills and the mills situated elsewhere in this country?

Mr. WILDER. That may be true; but still they are not using the cotton after it is produced. I am saying that no considerable portion of the market for cotton or cotton goods is in the South. It is comparatively small there. On the other hand, they are using a comparatively small amount of the elements in this country that support them in their cotton producing.

Mr. BARTLETT. The trouble about it is that two-thirds, or 62 or 63 per cent is exported to foreign countries.

Mr. WILDER. The world's markets undoubtedly enter into those conditions, but the facts are as I have stated.

THE DEMOCRATIC TIMES OF 1892–1896.

While I am about it I wish to refer for a few minutes to the personal experience I had in tussling with these alleged splendid four years of Democratic rule. Because of anticipation or fear of such a result we had the panic of 1892, which appears to have been well founded, for the Cleveland second administration came in in March, 1893, and the depression following I need not refer to, as it is too well known and too awful to repeat. Suffice it to say that after struggling with large financial matters and burdens the company with which I was connected, beginning with 1893, losing at the rate of $75,000 a year, in the fall of 1895 was forced to assign. At that time I was 40 years old. I supposed I had a competence. It engulfed all I had and left me $125,000 in debt. I refused to repudiate this debt but made no headway whatever until the Dingley bill had gotten into action. After 10 years of as hard work as any man ever did I got back onto my feet and made my name good with every man who stood by. Some few sold out, a comparatively small portion of the whole, and I did not deem it necessary or honorable to pay the purchasers a profit. My experience was that of thousands of others who look with alarm and dismay at the possibility of a repetition of such times.

Another important feature I wish to mention—the relation of the balance of trade, so-called, in this country to its general prosperity—which is frequently overlooked. The balance of trade is simply the question of whether or not we sell abroad more than we buy, or buy from abroad more than we sell. It is easily understood when we apply it to our own affairs. If we sell our product and services for more money than our expenses or living, we gain the difference. So with the country, which is simply a large business enterprise.

Now, impost duties, or tariff on imports, had been reduced to such an extent that under the conditions then existing the balance had been nearly or quite reached in 1892, and inasmuch as these duties should always be regulatory as distinct from free trade or for revenue purposes, of which I will speak more later, the moment they were lowered by the Wilson bill a flood of foreign-made goods came into this country. If the result of such activity is well understood by some of the speakers on this subject, they have kept their thoughts well concealed, for they certainly have not disclosed such. The moment a large amount of foreign manufactured goods come into this country it deprives the workmen in this country of just so much work, thereby not only increasing the amount of goods in this country to be sold over what there was before the floodgates opened, but decreasing at the same time the purchasing power by cutting off the income of the purchasers.

The four fiscal years nearest corresponding to the four years of the last Cleveland administration showed the total balance of trade in favor of this country to be the comparatively meager sum of $714,117,467, including gold (whereas in three years of Republican rule next succeeding, in one year it jumped to over $500,000,000) against which must be put probably $150,000,000 annually spent abroad by Americans, leaving a net average in our favor of less than $30,000,000 per year. If there is a man in this House who wants a recurrence of those conditions, I shall be glad to have him say so. How can he expect they will be any different under the same management, although possibly by another generation? During the 14 years after the Dingley bill became effective—that is, the full fiscal years since that time—the balance of trade was in favor of this country; or, in other words, we have sold more than we have purchased abroad the enormous sum of $6,474,980,183. Deduct from this the approximate amount the American people have spent abroad, of $2,800,000,000 (and I have allowed $50,000,000 a year more for the full period than was included in the previous four years of Democratic rule, because the American people were more able to spend abroad) and we have the net amount of balance of trade in our favor $3,674,980,183, which, divided by 14 years, gives the splendid average of over $250,000,000 per year, as against the last Democratic administration's annual average of less than $30,000,000. There may be some Members in this House who would like to repeat this awful four years, but they would not if they knew what they were talking about. No man who suffered during those four years as I suffered could contemplate its duplication except with the most awful forebodings. As stated, my experience was simply that of thousands of others.

Now, just a word in relation to the Canadian reciprocity bill already passed by this House, with its relation to the farmers' free-list bill before us. I need not refer to the fact—it has been repeated often enough—that every bill passed so far by this House had been previously passed by a Republican House, excepting, possibly, with some vicious additions. But I want to compare for a few moments the essential elements of this Canadian reciprocity measure with this bill before the House, known as the farmers' free bill. First, I want to say generally that when we pit the farmer against the factory, or the factory against the farmer, it is a self-evident injustice. It has been stated many times by those more eloquent than myself that their interests are mutual and must go hand in hand if this country would prosper, and, indeed, to use the expression of another, their interests are "inextricably intermingled." Second, I want to make a quotation about an inch long, which is the only thing I will "read into" this address. It is headed "Laurier will not go to the coronation," with a subheading, "Instead will remain at Ottawa to take charge of fight for reciprocity":

OTTAWA, ONTARIO, April 28.

The determination of the Canadian Government to ratify reciprocity was emphasized in Parliament to-day by the prime minister, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who said that he would not go to England to represent Canada at the imperial conference or the coronation of King George in June, but would remain at Ottawa and press the reciprocity agreement if the Conservative opposition persisted in obstructing the ratification of the pact.

It has been stated on the floor of this House in my hearing several times that this Canadian reciprocity measure was a lopsided arrangement in favor of Canada. If this item does not show conclusively that the Canadian Parliament does not consider it a lopsided thing in their favor, then, for a second time, I am utterly devoid of reasoning powers. The Canadian people are the nearest like our people of any nation—their conditions, their soil, their temperament, their method of living, their all. There are only about 8,000,000 of them—about the size of New York or Pennsylvania. The reciprocity measure may be to our disadvantage in some respects, and doubtless, by the quotation I have just read, the Canadians feel it will be to their disadvantage in some respects. This, I say, is the best possible evidence which we have before us that it is a fair deal. That it was so intended and worked out with the utmost care by President Taft and his assistants is beyond question. To compare this with putting items on the free list for peoples whose conditions are wholly unlike our own, in the wages earned and the conditions under which they live, besides being a hundred times greater in number, in the third instance passes my powers of reasoning. [Applause on the Republican side.]

When it comes to the theory of free trade or a tariff for revenue or any related activities, I am opposed to them. In the first place, theories—if by theory is meant a principle or a clear line of thought—while it is possible to apply such to matters of science it is absolutely impossible to apply them to human conditions. Possibly a theory might be applied to Divine conditions, but we are human, not divine. It is also possible that there may have been tariff considerations that great and wise men would stand for 25 years ago, or 15 years ago, that they would not stand for or would wish to change to-day. The gentleman from Illinois, ex-Speaker CANNON, made one of the noblest remarks the other day that I have ever heard made when his attention was called to a remark that he made in 1894 in reference to what he said at that time, about whether or not the market price of wheat was controlled in London, and he replied:

I have no pride in what I have said in former years.

And even though it was said as quoted—I think by the gentleman from Wisconsin—it seemed to make no difference with his view at the present time. So I say, because of the fact that we are dealing with human conditions, theories when we try to apply them to such become mere vagaries. Our tariff, as I have stated before, is and always must be regulatory. It is possible that the word "protection" to-day does not express the modern conditions correctly, but this term "regulatory" expresses, to my mind, my view of what a tariff should be. I mean that comparatively speaking it is immaterial whether a tariff raises any considerable revenue or not. It is well known that when a tariff is high it raises no revenue, and it only raises revenue when made low enough so that goods manufactured abroad can come into this country. To illustrate, if we buy $100,000,000 abroad on which we pay an ad valorem duty of 15 per cent the American people have to put out $115,000,000 to get these goods in from abroad, $100,000,000 going abroad and $15,000,000 going into the United States Treasury as impost duties. This $100,000,000, and for every multiple thereof an equal amount, would represent from $50,000,000 to $75,000,000 of American labor, and consequently from $50,000,000 to $75,000,000 of purchasing power in this country.

You say my quota of labor is too large for this amount of products, but I tell you nay; there is not only the last completing factory's pay roll, but there is the pay roll of every factory that furnishes materials and supplies for the last or completing factory, so that the entire pay roll for any $100,000,000 of manufactured goods brought in from abroad decreases our purchasing power from $50,000,000 to $75,000,000, and in many instances decreases it by the whole amount less the margins of the various manufacturers, and even much of this goes out for services of employees, transportation, and use of capital and otherwise. Now, where is the profit to this country—and this country for the purposes of this discussion must be considered as if it were yourself or a little community of people—to lose from $50,000,000 to $75,000,000 in purchasing power for the sake of raising $15,000,000, and even this from ourselves, for revenue? We by far better raise this $15,000,000 by internal tax on these very people who would be glad to bear the burden if given the additional business. There are, however, certain items that can not be manufactured favorably in this country, and these are the realms in which our revenue by way of impost duties can well be raised, besides many classes of goods that can not be produced in this country at all. Personally I do not care what the tariff is on silks and satins, diamonds, wines, and other unnecessary things that people insist on buying from abroad even though they pay fancy prices therefor, because those who are able pay these duties and the whole purchase is optional. But all this, as I said before, should be regulatory so that the business of this country may prosper in the sanest fashion and should be worked to the end that the goods involving much labor used in this country should be made in this country, and, in my estimation, it ill becomes the Democratic Party, especially our friends from the Sunny South, to object to the burdens that they bear, which are insignificant at best, on their bagging and ties, so long as their cotton can be maintained at 15 cents per pound. This, gentlemen of the Democratic Party, must be credited to the Republican Party. [Applause on the Republican side.] I do not see how you can get away from that.

Much confusion arises from the effort to solve a great problem of this sort by specific instances. One says that the price of wheat, being an article of general export, is controlled in London; another says that it is controlled where the bulk of the product is sold. Others say that we should have free beef, that we can get our surplus from the Argentine and other places. Quite likely all of these things are true under certain conditions.

It certainly is true, and facts have proven it over and over again, that there are times when a very small portion of the supply controls the price; for instance, a large wheat corner has been broken with a few millions of bushels. Northern Pacific Railroad stock some years ago went skyrocketing to $1,000 because a comparatively few shares could not be obtained; but that case in the North Dakota town where the wheat was at a higher price on our side of the street than on the Canadian side, which would, of course, be the reverse on our manufactured articles, while a necessity under the local conditions rather than a marvel, yet when these very people, on either side of the street, undertook to sell a carload of wheat of the same grade for export they would get the same price for it. Again, if we should have a shortage of wheat in this country at any time, the export or even general market would not control in any local instance, excepting at a price plus the cost of bringing the wheat from some other place. Again, the United States and Canada are large exporters of wheat, they have exported for years past, we expect they will export for years to come, and if at any time, as a matter of fact, wheat in export quantities—that is, quantities not controlled by local conditions—is exported, if the Canadian price was lower than the United States price, or vice versa, the country having the lower price would necessarily have all the export market they could supply, because the markets of the world will pay for wheat from one country of the same grade just the same as from another country.

Again, what is the use of talking about Argentine beef coming into this country and affecting the beef price here to any extent so long as this country exports cattle and beef? If Argentine's price was lower than ours, they would have all the export business, would they not, and the United States could not export against them? But these items, when they come to be worked specifically, are simply confusion. The human mind can not follow out such things specifically, and we must take into consideration what has happened in the past and from that build what will happen in the future. "By their fruits ye shall know them. Do men gather grapes of thorns, or figs of thistles?" Look what happened to this country, as I have stated from the record, under Democratic and Republican rule on the single item of cotton, that has been talked so much about in the last few days in this House. Under Democratic rule 9 cents per pound and 15 cents under Republican rule. I am willing to stake my whole hope of success and prosperity on what will happen by what has happened.

I do not understand how this can be the greatest deliberative body on earth one day and then be informed the next by some individual Member of the legislation that is to be passed in the coming days, for together they make a paradox. And for these reasons, which can be readily applied, I stand opposed to this bill. We have gone far enough at the present time with the Canadian reciprocity bill. I have little use for a steam roller, regardless of the party operating it, and believe that all of our affairs should be treated with the utmost care, and while changes should be made continuously, they should be made with the utmost discretion, and this headlong falling asunder in our midst with the usual result should be avoided, if possible.

And may the good Lord encompass and speedily facilitate this brilliantly illumined, pyrotechnical, new Democratic steam roller in its flight down hill, backward, until it disappears altogether in the sepulcher of the demnition bow wows already yawning for it in the abyss at the foot of the hill. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DIXON].

Mr. DIXON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, for 14 years the legislative and executive departments of the Government have been under the complete control of the Republican Party, and during that period the burdens of taxation have been gradually and greatly increased, the expenses of the Government multiplied many times, the number of trusts become too numerous to enumerate, the power of the special interests has become stronger each year, and they have become the most favored objects of legislation. The people in the last election repudiated that party for its faithlessness to the interests of the people and its open and flagrant violation of its platform pledges. The Democratic Party has been restored to supremacy in this Chamber, it has returned to the seat of its former power and glory, and here it will remain if it proves true to its principles and avowed purposes. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Ever since Congress assembled in special session our party has been engaged in an earnest effort to carry into effect our platform pledges.

In less than four weeks our party has demonstrated its faithfulness to those pledges upon which it received the votes of the people. It has taken from the Speaker of the House the power to appoint committees, and thus control legislation. It has passed through this House a joint resolution to give the people the right to elect their United States Senators by a direct vote of the people. It has passed a bill compelling campaign committees to inform the people before an election the sources of the money used for the expenses of the campaign and election. It has sought to thus give notice as far as possible of the contributions by the beneficiaries of special legislation, the favored interests. It has provided a way and will reduce the expense of this House by nearly $200,000 by cutting off useless offices. It has placed before the House this bill placing upon the free list many of the articles of necessity to the American farmer, and will pass the same within a few days, and if it does not become a law the Republican Senate and President will be responsible for the failure. Trace Republican legislation from its beginning and there has been no measure of relief to the people ever enacted by that party that carried so large a benefit as the pending bill. The farmer has always been the injured party in Republican legislation; he is the party benefited in Democratic legislation. Upon his back the Republicans placed the heaviest burdens of tariff taxation, and we relieve him of part of that load by our first tariff bill. He is the very last person considered in your legislation; he is the first one cared for in our legislation. We are proud of the fact that the creation of the Department of Agriculture in our Government was a Democratic measure, and the act creating the same was signed by a Democratic President. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

We boast of the great wealth of our country; the farmers created that wealth. They are the basis of the prosperity of our country. Agriculture is the oldest and most important of all industries, and our progress is measured by its development and advancement. In the prosperity of the farmer is involved and dependent the happiness and prosperity of all classes. Bountiful harvest to the farmer brings prosperity to all classes and diffuses its blessings among all the people. Failure to him brings want and misery to all. The Nation prospers when the farmer prospers, and the results are felt throughout the world. He asks no special favors from the Government, and has received none. The favors shown to the special interests by high protective laws have been to the detriment of the farmer, and upon his back have rested most heavily those unjust burdens of tariff taxation. He asks but for a fair deal, and from Republicans he has asked in vain. We propose to do justice to this large class of citizens, who have made this country the envy and pride of the world. Upon the farmer rests the burden of feeding and clothing the world, and the Republican policy has taken from him by tariff taxation a very large part of the profits of his labor. He is unprotected, and while governmental favoritism is shown to other industries he, alone and unaided, sells his products in free competition in the markets of the world. He produces more than our people can consume and must seek foreign markets, and the price of these products in the foreign markets fix the price of his products not only abroad but at home. Congress can not by law fix those prices or affect them; they are settled by a law beyond the power of Congress—the law of supply and demand. When the supply is large the price is low, and when the demand is great the price is high. Any law that seeks to change that rule is made for deception. The Republicans have for years sought to deceive the farmer by claiming omnipotent power through tariff laws, that a duty on his products enhanced the value; but to-day its most eminent followers have confessed that their professions were insincere and made only to deceive, and any duty on products that must be sold abroad was useless.

Both political parties in their last campaign promised revision of the tariff. The Democratic Party, faithful to its established custom of frankness and sincerity, promised revision downward; the Republicans simply promised revision. Candidate Taft interpreted that platform as downward revision, and upon this interpretation received the majority of the votes of the American people. How that interpretation was carried into legislation the Payne-Aldrich bill answers. How the outraged and deceived people felt is attested by the present Democratic majority in the House.

Instead of relieving the people, their burdens were increased, and the desperate attempts to show the reductions in that bill have failed, and even the so-called reductions were in name only, and prohibitive rates still continue. President Taft, in seeking to allay popular outcry and as far as possible keep afloat the battered and torn Republican ship, sought to secure the Canadian trade agreement. His own party, torn asunder by internal strife, but, as ever, loyal and subservient to the special interests, would not even grant this small measure of relief, and the Democrats aided the President in securing this result. It is not what the Democrats desired or would have secured, and it is not an answer to the popular demand for tariff reduction. It is only a step in the right direction. It is an opening of the tariff wall that has surrounded our country; it is a break in the protective policy that will lead to its overthrow. It is an acknowledgment that the Democratic policy of opening the markets to our trade will benefit our own people. It is opposed by every trust in the country, by every special interest that has grown great and powerful from wealth drawn from the people by tariff laws.

This bill placing on the free list the different items mentioned is a Democratic measure, and our party is alone responsible for it being here to-day; no Republican voted in favor of giving this House an opportunity to pass the bill. It is presented as the first answer to the people who have asked for relief and help. We are the wealthiest nation on earth. Our farms and farm property represent $25,000,000,000 of the Nation's wealth. We have 6,000,000 farms and 12,000,000 persons engaged in farming, and this represents one-third of the entire population. Our farms and their products increase in value each year. In 1910 our farms yielded a wealth valued at $8,926,000,000. Last year our corn crop was 3,121,281,000 bushels, and was worth not less than $1,500,000,000. It would have paid the interest-bearing indebtedness of the United States and bought all the gold and silver mined in all the countries of the world last year. The production of the great Steel Corporation was but little over half as much as the value of last year's corn crop.

We harvested 60,000,000 tons of hay, worth $720,000,000; 691,777,000 bushels of wheat, worth $625,000,000; and our cotton crop was worth $900,000,000; oats worth $380,000,000; tobacco, $95,000,000.

We have not only fed and clothed our own people, but sent abroad last year to feed and clothe the world $871,107,067 worth of farm products.

The first articles we mention in this free-list bill are agricultural implements. In 1905, the last year for which we have had full reports printed, the total value of agricultural implements manufactured was $112,007,344, of which we exported $20,721,741. In 1910 we exported of these articles $28,124,033, an increase of 629 per cent in 20 years. Our exportations are about one-fifth of the total amount manufactured. These goods are sold in every part of the world in competition with the world. As they meet and control the foreign market, they certainly need not fear competition with foreign-made goods at home. The tariff has prevented any competition to speak of, but these articles have sold higher here without competition than abroad with competition. Our farmers are entitled to at least as good treatment as the foreign farmer. The factories manufacturing agricultural implements have been reduced in number from 1,943 in 1880 to 648 in 1905.

The farmer abroad uses agricultural implements made here, but purchased at lower prices than sold to our farmers, yet the grain so cultivated is sold in competition with the world and with the products of the American farmer.

Our wheat growers compete with the wheat growers of Russia, England, France, Hungary, India, and all the grain-growing countries of Europe and Asia, and their products meet in the markets of the world the products of the poorest paid labor in the world.

The serfs of Russia, the oppressed peasantry of Hungary, and the people of India all pour the products of their labor into the free markets of Europe and are sold in competition with the world.

Under the Dingley law from 1898 to 1907, 10 years, the importations and duties from agricultural implements were:

Importations	$203,475
Duties	40,692

On a value of about $20,300 a year yielding annual duties of $4,000. In 18 years we have imported less than $400,000 worth of agricultural implements of all kinds, collecting duties less than $60,000 or $3,000 a year.

Our exportations are increasing yearly and our goods are found in all the countries of the world. During the last 10 years we exported agricultural implements as follows:

Agricultural implements exported.

[From the United States Statistical Abstract, 1909.]

Years.	Mowers and reapers.	Plows and cultivators.	All other.
1900	$11,243,000	$2,178,000	$2,677,000
1901	9,943,000	1,888,000	4,481,000
1902	8,818,000	2,791,000	4,677,000
1903	10,326,000	3,169,000	7,510,000
1904	11,568,000	3,537,000	7,643,000
1905	10,599,000	2,892,000	7,269,000
1906	12,150,000	4,128,000	8,275,000
1907	15,078,000	3,492,000	8,366,000
1908	13,570,000	3,139,000	7,454,000
1909	14,052,000	3,705,000	7,846,000
Total	117,347,000	30,919,000	66,198,000
1910	11,972,000	7,498,000	11,820,000

Or a grand total of $245,755,000 exported, as against about $200,000 imported for the same years. We sell to the world more than a thousand times as much as we buy from the world. We have been exporting about $20,000,000 a year, or about one-fifth of our home production, as is shown by the following:

Value of agricultural products manufactured in United States as per census reports, 1905.

1890	81,271,000
1900	101,207,000
1905	112,007,000

With this enormous implement production and the trifling importation, the time has come for free trade in agricultural implements. Our exports to foreign markets in 1910 were as follows:

To United Kingdom	$913,801
To France	2,960,000
To Germany	1,580,000
To Italy	471,000
To Netherlands	395,000
To Russia in Europe	5,370,000
To other Europe	2,088,000
To Canada	4,321,000
To Mexico	601,000
To Cuba	337,000
To Argentina	7,502,000
To other South America	1,337,000
To British Oceania	1,369,000
To other Asia and Oceania	621,000
To Africa	1,382,000
To all other countries	51,000

There is no necessity for a tariff upon agricultural implements, even from the protection standpoint. The only excuse for one is to assist the trust manufacturer further to plunder the American farmer. The Member from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] contended that placing farm implements upon the free list would be of but small benefit to the farmer, since the revenue derived from the present tariff was but $2,775 in 1905, and that this small amount of saving was so trivial when divided among the numerous farmers. This reasoning is absurd. By this process of reasoning, if the tariff rate were absolutely prohibitive and no revenue received, then it would be folly to change it, as he would say it cost the farmers nothing. The same argument would sustain all the prohibitive rates in the Payne-Aldrich bill. The fact that the revenue is so small shows that the rate is either practically prohibitive or that foreigners are unable to successfully compete with our manufacturers.

It is of vital importance to our farmers that the bagging and sacking of the agricultural products be made free of duty in order to secure the most favorable price possible. The sacks, bags, and coverings used in the transportation of agricultural products are indispensable in the marketing of these goods, and as the products themselves can not receive the benefit of any protection, as they are export products and their price fixed abroad, it is unfair and unjust that the farmer should pay tariff tax upon the sacks and bags necessary for the marketing of these products, so we put them on the free list. Hoop or band iron or steel for baling cotton or other commodities, and wire for baling hay, straw, and other agricultural products, we also place on the free list. The grain from the northern farmer and the cotton from the southern farmer are thus given equal and fair treatment. As the northern grains must be sacked, the southern cotton must be covered, and we thus reduce at once a large expense necessary in the operation of any farm.

The farmer is thus supplied the wire for baling his hay and straw without the payment of an additional sum by reason of the tariff. In the Middle West, where thousands of tons of hay and straw are annually baled for the market, this relief from exorbitant prices will be of inestimable value to the farmer compelled to prepare his hay for shipment by baling. In the past he has been forced to swell the earnings of the trusts by his contributions in the purchase of his wire. We have sought to relieve him of this burden.

Under the Wilson bill ties for baling cotton were free. In 1898, 16,265,506 pounds were imported, valued at $239,498, or 1½ cents a pound, without freight, insurance, or commissions.

The Dingley law imposed a half a cent a pound duty on all hoop or band iron, or hoop or band steel, cut to lengths, or wholly or partly manufactured into hoops or ties, coated or not coated with paint or any other preparation, with or without buckles or fastenings for baling cotton or any other commodity.

The importations fell off at once to nothing, and it was not until 1900 that a million pounds came in. The average importations in the eight years, 1900–1907, have been about 2,000,000 pounds. All duties during that period were $84,274, or an average annual revenue of $10,534.

The duties are and have been very small, and the Government, in the interest of the cotton farmers, can well afford to make cotton ties free. The Payne bill reduced the rate of duty from one-half cent a pound to three-tenths cent, which was a proper move, but not radical enough to meet the demands of the case. For the first year of this law we imported a value of $9,389, collecting a duty of $1,498.

Wheat growers are given free binding twine, as America can compete with the world on that article, and it is apparently true that America can compete with the world in the manufacture of cotton ties.

Under the Wilson bill in 1898 the value of all importations of cotton ties free was $239,498. The value of all binding twine imported free in 1907 was $227,499, or practically the same as cotton ties in 1898 under the Wilson law. It would fairly follow from this that if binding twine is free because we can compete cotton ties should also be free. One is as able to take care of itself as the other.

On page 4825 of the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee of the House Mr. C. Lee McMillan, of New Orleans, stated that the tariff tax per bale was 4½ cents, or 22½ cents per bundle of 5 bales, under the Dingley law, or 2.7 cents per bale, or 13.5 cents, under the present law.

On the 13,000,000 bales of cotton produced in 1907, had the ties been imported the tariff duties would have been $585,000, and under the Payne law, $351,000. These ties were not all imported, inasmuch as the Government revenue for this year was but $1,498.

The difference of approximately $349,502 went to swell the profits of the American manufacturers.

Our manufacturers can produce cotton ties as cheaply as any other manufacturers, and it is not a square deal to give them a margin of nearly a half million of dollars as unearned tariff profits, profits which the American cotton farmer must pay.

It is impossible to give figures which will show the importation of wire used for baling hay, straw, and other farm products, as no separate account is kept for this particular wire.

BARBED FENCE WIRE, WIRE RODS, AND WIRE FENCING.

These articles are a necessity to the farmer. He is no longer able to maintain rail and board fences, as the price of timber is too high to be used for this purpose. He must of necessity resort to the wire fencing, and it is an item of considerable expense in his yearly accounts. He should be able to purchase it at the lowest possible price, and for that reason we have placed it on the free list. The tariff rates on these articles have compelled our people to depend upon the great steel industry for their supply. The Steel Trust is the largest combination of wealth in the country, and this wealth has accumulated by means of tariff legislation. With absolute control of our markets, and with power to fix their prices at will, they have drawn from the American farmer a constant flow of gold to their own treasury. Not satisfied with the control of this market, they have annually exported immense quantities of their goods and furnished them abroad cheaper than to our own people. While they have fought Canadian reciprocity in the name of the farmer, yet they compel the American farmer to pay for his barbed wire and fencing 50 per cent more than they sell the same fencing to the Canadian farmer. The same is true of horseshoes and wire nails and many other of the finished products, and their love for the farmer is measured by the amount of money they can take from his pockets.

Imports of barbed and other wire for the years ended June 30, 1909 and 1910.

Barbed wire:
Exported in 1909	$3,752,964
Exported in 1910	4,521,221
Other wire:
Exported in 1909	3,542,627
Exported in 1910	4,676,784

We exported about as much barbed wire as all other wire combined, and sell it in all parts of the world.

In 1905 manufacturers reported a total production of all kinds of wire of $37,914,000.

We give, by this bill, to the housewife her sewing machine with the duty free. This article is no longer a luxury but a necessity and is found in almost all the homes of the people. Our machines are used in almost every country of the world, and an American traveler sees them for sale in every European port.

This is another American article that is sold abroad cheaper than at home. Recently the prices quoted for domestic and foreign use were as follows:

Sewing machines.	Domestic price.	Foreign price.
Fine	$27.50	$20.75
Medium	22.00	17.50
Cheap	18.00	12.00

I presume that these manufacturers have also urged the farmers to protest against Canadian reciprocity—they fear the least break in the wall of protection and exclusiveness. In 1905 the number of establishments making these machines was less than half those in 1880, but with thrice the capital invested, and the total value of the finished machines was $20,869,870, and the amount exported was $6,104,279, or nearly one-third of the total manufactured. These exportations increased to $7,513,852 in 1910. When such quantities are exported and sold in free competition abroad, do they need protection from competition at home?

The Payne-Aldrich bill gives a duty of 30 per cent on sewing machines.

We have no disposition to injure or cripple any American industry, but we are not disposed to allow any American industry to injure or cripple the American people. Their duty simply allows the manufacturer of these goods to absolutely control the American market from foreign competition and charge our people the price just below what the duty allows them, and then, at lower prices, to sell to foreigners in open and free competition. We simply require them hereafter to treat their customers alike and prevent the discrimination against our own people.

The first tariff bill and the one which Thomas Jefferson assisted in framing put salt on the free list. Salt is not the product of human genius or skill. Nature has produced it for human use; it is in the waters of the sea, as well as in the earth. Animal existence depends upon its supply. It is wrong to place a tax upon such an absolute necessity to both man and beast.

The removal of this duty on salt is a great benefit to the packer of pork and beef, to our butter makers, and people generally. A few people are interested in having a monopoly of the salt business, but we rejoice in giving the people free salt.

LEATHER, BOOTS AND SHOES, HARNESS AND SADDLERY.

Hides were placed on the free list in 1909, and the Democrats then endeavored to have the item here mentioned placed on the free list, but the Republicans refused to permit it. Leather is being marketed in this country at low cost and is a necessity to our people. Boots and shoes made in this country are sold throughout the world and compete in all the markets. American machinery used in this industry are superior to that of any other country, and there is no necessity of this tariff, and while we received last year $97,325 in duties from this schedule, they are of such universal use and demand that our people are entitled to them at the lowest price possible.

No industry will be injured, and millions of people will be benefited, and this is the reason for its enactment.

Leather and its manufactures—boots, shoes, and harness—may be classed among the prime necessities of life, and with hides on the free list, should be admitted free of duty. The importations and duties on such leather and its products as are affected by this bill in 1910 were as follows:

Description.	Duty.	Value.	Amount of duty.
	Per cent.
Band and sole leather	20	$8,549	$1,709
Band and sole leather	5	947,191	47,359
Calfskins, tanned	20	22,392	4,478
Grain, buff and split	7½	106,305	7,079
Patent leather, 20 to 30 cents per pound and 8 to 20 per cent, or from	25 to 35	203,490	59,022
Tanned but unfinished	20	7,200	1,442
Tanned but unfinished	15	88,658	13,298
Skins, dressed and finished (Dingley)	20	4,484	899
Skins, dressed and finished	15	808,318	121,247
Upper leather	20	42,087	8,417
Upper leather	15	93,198	13,979
All other	20	223,321	44,664
All other	15	727,871	109,180
Philippines and Cuba		33	3
Leather cut into uppers	15 to 35	10,572	2,577
Total		3,550,133	484,057
Boots and shoes	10 to 25	171,805	22,694
Harness and saddlery	45	75,238	33,857
Total		3,797,176	540,608

From this it will be seen that our imports were comparatively unimportant. On the other hand, we imported free hides as follows:

Buffalo hides	$1,341,677
Calfskins	18,059,350
Other cattle hides	46,746,999
Goatskins	30,868,000
Horse skins	3,081,000
Kangaroo skins	415,000
Sheepskins	11,257,000
Other skins	1,843,000
Total	113,640,026
Hide cuttings	1,605,482
Total	115,245,508

There can be no valid reason for giving free entrance to $113,640,000 worth of free raw material for leather manufactures and charging from 5 to 45 per cent on the manufactured products, leather, boots and shoes, and harness. Our imports of $3,797,176 are in no sense a menace to the manufacturing class, while the revenue, $540,608, is no compensation to the consumer, who argues that while millions are conceded to the Leather Trust in free importations of raw stock at least one-fortieth as much might be permitted to have the same privilege in boots and shoes, harness, and leather.

What is the condition of our leather industry? Do we make all we need? Our imports of leather—practically a raw material—in 1910 amounted to but $3,797,176. If 92,000,000 people use only 4 cents worth of foreign leather per head per annum then it may fairly be assumed that our home manufacturers have the entire field to themselves and need protection of no kind whatever.

Our exports for 1909 and 1910 were:

	1909	1910
Sole leather	$6,887,000	$8,419,473
Upper leather:
Kid, glazed	3,573,000	16,675,613
Patent	169,000	728,585
Splits	17,624,000	11,289,000
All other	2,159,000
Total leather	30,412,000	37,112,671
Boots and shoes	10,305,000	13,216,237
Harness	650,000	794,936
Grand total	41,367,000	51,123,844

This is a remarkable showing for leather and leather goods, fully warranting the placing of these articles on the free list. In 1892 our exports were but $12,000,000, and the $100,000,000 mark under the impetus of free hides may fairly be expected in a few years. We sell leather and leather goods to all the world, but principally to Great Britain. We sold Great Britain sole leather in 1905 amounting to $4,400,000. Japan bought $3,400,000. Great Britain bought $10,900,000 of other leathers, while all other countries took $6,000,000. American leather was sold in Asia to more than $1,000,000. America outside of the United States bought $2,000,000, while Australasia and Africa took more than half a million. Great Britain bought $2,000,000 of our boots and shoes, four-fifths of all our exports to Europe. Canada bought $1,000,000; Mexico, $1,500,000; and the West Indies $2,000,000. Our harness and saddles found sales all around the globe.

We export far more leather than does Great Britain, about the same quantity of boots and shoes, but far less of saddles and harness. British manufacturers of boots and shoes, leather and leather goods can not compete with our manufacturers of these goods on a free-trade basis, and this bill will open the way to a freer trade, which will ultimately redound to the interest of the consumers.

For many years prominent manufacturers of boots and shoes from all parts of the country said, "Give us free hides and we will consent to free boots and shoes." Free hides have been given, and this bill will carry into effect the other part of the proposal.

We sold abroad last year over $13,000,000 worth of boots and shoes, and they were sold in free competition with the world. If our manufacturers can successfully compete with foreign-made goods in the open markets abroad, they can surely compete with foreign-made goods in our own country.

MEAT AND MEAT PRODUCTS.

For the year ending June 30, 1910, our importations and duties were as follows:

Articles.	Value.	Duties.
Bacon and hams	$117,880	$20,384
Beef, fresh	61,110	12,830
Extracts of meat	151,398	33,472
Venison	25,798	2,518
All other fresh	7,374	826
Lamb, fresh	3,806	608
Lard	446	58
Meats, n. s. p. f	4,559	456
Meats, prepared or preserved	451,780	112,936
Mutton, fresh	56,657	10,414
Pork, fresh	28,905	2,555
Poultry, dead	52,843	15,032
Veal, fresh	2,655	357
Total	965,211	212,446

We import less than $1,000,000 worth of meat and meat products, and the duties, $212,446, or approximately 22 per cent, can very appropriately be remitted in view of the fact that the preparation and sale of meats for the domestic market have passed under the control of the Beef Trust and its allies.

EXPORTS.

In 1909 our exports were as follows, as shown by the Statistical Abstract:

Beef products:
Beef, canned	$1,645,822
Beef, fresh	12,698,594
Beef, salted or pickled	3,438,048
Beef, other cured	34,319
Total beef products	17,816,783
Hog products:
Bacon	25,920,490
Hams and shoulders	23,526,307
Pork, canned	620,193
Pork, fresh	938,025
Pork, pickled	4,599,431
Lard	52,712,569
Total hog products	108,317,015
Lard compounds	6,115,307
Mutton	141,654
Oleo oil and neutral lard	19,126,741
Poultry and game	848,644

All other:
Canned	1,060,222
All other	1,783,331
Total	30,073,554
Grand total meat products	156,207,352

For every dollar's worth of meat bought outside the country we sell $156 worth. There is little danger of free trade in meat products injuring the industries of the United States.

MEAT PRODUCTION.

The special census of the United States for 1905 discloses the fact that our manufacturers and packers put up the following product values for that year:

	Value of product.
Lard, refined	$6,128,601
Sausage	8,122,904
Slaughtering and meat products, wholesale	801,757,137
Total	816,008,642

The great slaughtering houses report their lard and sausage product as a part of the total product, which accounts for the small showing of these manufacturers in the above table.

We import	$665,211
We export	156,207,352
We produce	816,008,642

By this bill we lose about $212,446 revenue. Our meat production would be largely augmented could we add the farm and home slaughter of animals.

Imports of flour, meal, and similar foods for year ended June 30, 1910.

	Value.	Duties.
Bran and mill feed	$323,486	$64,697
Bread and biscuit	137,779	27,551
Buckwheat flour	1,061	265
Corn meal	200	29
Oat meal and rolled oats	31,071	5,207

Wheat screenings	122,385	12,239
Oat hulls	254,192	48,667

Rye flour	14,600
Wheat flour	51,157,366
Bran, middlings, etc	1,222,406
Preparations for table food	1,858,646
Total	57,035,839

Production, 1905.

Manufactures of bakery products	$269,609,861
Flour and grist mills	713,033,395
Other food preparations	61,180,000
Total	1,043,823,256

Other nations have large holds on the foreign demand for flour, but the mills of the United States ship abroad more of this necessary commodity every year than the mills of all the rest of the world combined.

We have put lumber on the free list in order to allow our people to shelter themselves from the cold. The Democrats are in sympathy with the poor. In fact, our party is known as the poor man's party, and it is the highest encomium that can be given a party that it guards and protects those who are unable to protect and defend themselves.

Of the 16,000,000 families in this country, less than 5,000,000 of their houses are unencumbered by mortgages, and the remaining 11,000,000 either have no homes or have mortgaged ones. We propose to make it easier for our people to own their homes. The prices of lumber have increased so much that it is almost impossible for the man with moderate means or a fair salary to manage to build a house; it is impossible for the men with small wages to do so. The easier for our people to own their own property, the better for our country, since it will result in better citizens and a higher citizenship.

One objection made by the Republicans against this bill is that it is class legislation, and the report of the minority members of the Ways and Means Committee place their objection on this ground. What consistency in such an objection? That party has for years enacted class legislation; in fact, the tariff laws are for the benefit of certain classes; yet when we seek to relieve the farmer, who represents one-third of our entire population, from their class legislation, they protest and object and denounce it as class legislation. This measure benefits all the people, but we would support it if it limited its benefits to the farmers. Your tariff laws are class legislation, and we can not touch them without your raising this cry. It is all right for your party to pass class legislation, but when we seek to correct your vicious laws you raise this cry. We believe in equal and exact justice to all and special privileges to none, and we will restore this principle to our laws, even if we meet with your cry of class legislation.

Another objection to the bill is that it is sectional. Why? Because it gives to the southern farmer covering for his cotton and ties to hold it suitable for marketing. Both are essential to the shippers of cotton, and the southern farmers are entitled to this relief. They raised last year $900,000,000 of cotton and exported millions of dollars' worth, and helped to secure for the country a favorable trade balance. This balance is what builds up the wealth of the Nation. This cry of sectionalism is unworthy of even the Republican Party. The war has been over for nearly 50 years, and you seek to reopen the wounds of that conflict and arouse another section of the country by seeking to show that they have been discriminated against. This claim is untrue.

What more can be given the northern or western farmer? His implements of trade are being made free; every agricultural implement he uses is put on the free list. The sacks to market his grain, the wagon in which to haul it, the shovels and scoops to unload it, the wire with which to bale his hay and straw. What can be added? The Steel Trust is the injured party in the ties used in baling cotton, its profits will be lessened, and to protect this greatest of all corporations, and the one whose wealth has been taken from the people by the tariff law, we see Republican leaders raise the cry of sectionalism. It is the cry of the Steel Trust and repeated by those who would allow its plundering to continue.

As Democrats we have no political debts due to those special interests, and we rejoice at the opportunity to relieve the people of their exactions. This bill, with its inestimable benefits, will be soon presented for passage. Its support by the Democrats is assured.

We hear the same cry and protest against this bill that will be made when any schedule in the Payne-Aldrich bill is touched. The industries affected loudly protest and object, and we must disregard the protests or continue to tax the people forever on their special productions. The arguments presented are not for the good of the people, but for the very few benefited. If we wait to gain the consent or receive the approval of the people who make money from the present rates there will be no revision now or hereafter. No tariff rate can be lowered if we consult the judgment of the beneficiaries of the rates.

Our party promised to reduce the tariff, and there was no proviso to the promise that we would reduce it only after having received the approval of its beneficiaries. That was the course of the Republican Party—its first consideration was to the beneficiaries and the interests of the people were forgotten—and as they neglected the people in their legislation they were neglected by the people at the ballot box. The contest is one between the interests of the people and the beneficiaries of special legislation, who believe the people should be taxed for their enrichment. In this contest our party will not hesitate to choose. We will stand with the people and against the special interests and upon the pledges of our party platform.

The tariff is a tax or duty levied upon articles imported into this country. Articles thus imported are taxed according to the tariff schedules, and this tax is first paid by the importer, but the price of the articles is increased by the duty thus collected, and the consumer ultimately pays the same, although the money paid in the first instance by the importer goes into the National Treasury. To the extent that the tariff is protection the tax is always paid upon the article by the consumer and goes into the pocket of the protected producer. One system is legitimate taxation; the other is taxation for special interest.

A tax is not a source of wealth or a means of development. The effect of a protective tariff is to distribute unfairly the reward of labor, prevent its natural diffusion, and concentrate it in the hands of a few people. It is a tax levied by the Government on all of the people for the benefit of a favored few.

Protection is demanded in the name of labor, but labor itself is unprotected. We forbid foreign goods, but we welcome the foreign laborer. The foreign laborer competes with our laborers in every field of industry and is employed in this country in the protected industries more extensively than in the unprotected. The manufacturer is protected, the laborer is unprotected, but he must compete in the open and free market and is compelled to buy all the necessities of life in a highly protected market.

American labor is the cheapest in the world when measured by a true standard—the productiveness of labor. Our laborers are intelligent, skillful, and industrious. The wages here are larger because the work is much more efficient and the amount performed is so large.

The real price of labor is the amount of the necessaries of life that labor can buy with those wages. Wages are not measured in dollars, but in the purchasing power of the wage. The laborer does not work for the sole sake of employment, but to supply the needs and comforts of his home. What the laborer wants is the highest returns for this labor. His prosperity is measured by what is left after the necessary supplies for his home are purchased. If his wages are increased, but the necessities of life are increased in price more rapidly than his wages are, then he is poorer, though in fact his wages may be larger. In the last 10 years wages have increased 22 per cent; the cost of the necessities of life has increased 60 per cent; and the Payne-Aldrich bill gave no relief as to the cost of these necessities.

The interests which have secured the high protective rates of the present law pretend that this great amount of protection is necessary to compensate them for the higher wages they pay their workmen as compared to the wages paid by foreign manufacturers. This is a fraudulent pretense, unsupported by facts. As a matter of fact, the labor cost in many of these protected industries is cheaper at home than abroad, and in most of them the per cent of tariff duty is greatly in excess of the total labor cost paid in the manufacturing of the protected products.

The Statistical Abstract, published by the Government, shows that the value of the finished product of all the manufacturing industries of the United States for 1905, the latest date for which the Government has published the statistics, is $14,802,147,087. The amount paid in wages in said year in the production of said manufactured articles was $2,611,540,532, which gives the total labor cost for all of the said articles as 17 per cent, while the tariff rates are from 30 per cent to 100 per cent on said articles. In other words, the tariff rates cover the entire labor cost. It not only covers whatever alleged difference exists between the labor cost in this country and in foreign countries, but it also covers the entire labor cost and then gives a profit many times the cost of the labor.

The manufacturers of iron and steel in 1905 produced $941,071,093 worth of finished products, and paid in wages for their manufacture $143,809,576, or 15 per cent of the value of the finished product. And these articles are given by the Payne bill protection more than twice the entire labor cost. This is done for the alleged purpose of equalizing wages at home and abroad; in other words, they are given a protection as a bonus, in addition to full payment of the entire labor cost of production.

The cotton manufacturers in 1905 turned out $442,451,218 worth of manufactured goods, and paid in wages $94,377,695, or 21 per cent of the value of the finished product. The Payne bill gives manufacturers protection of 50.27 per cent, or 29.73 per cent above the labor cost. These rates are increased above the rates of the Dingley bill. No possible justification can be given for this increase or the extravagant protection afforded this industry under the Payne-Aldrich bill.

The manufacturers of wool products produced in 1905 goods to the value of $380,934,003, and paid in wages $70,797,524, or 18 per cent. The protection afforded this industry under the Payne law is 40 per cent above the entire cost of labor in the manufacture thereof.

The manufacturers of silk in 1905 produced $133,288,072 worth of that article, and the wages paid were $26,767,943, or 20 per cent. The protection afforded by the Payne bill is 30 per cent above the entire cost of labor.

Are these reasonable profits promised by the Republican platform after equalizing the cost of labor at home and abroad?

A tariff rate equal to the entire labor cost of the finished product would certainly be sufficient, as the amount of wages would not then be considered in competing with foreign goods and our people would be granted this great advantage, since it must be conceded that foreign manufacturers must at least pay some wages. A tariff based on an advantage covering the entire labor cost would be a great revision downward. Do the schedules of the Payne law show the same to be constructed upon the equalization of wages at home and abroad? There is not a single item in the law written upon that principle.

The Republicans claim that our great increase of wealth and our national advancement has been caused by our high protection laws. It is like all of their other claims—false—and can not be proven by the facts.

Under the low-tariff law of 1846 the census reports show greater per cent of gains in value of all farm products than in the last 10 years.

In the production of corn, the great basic product of agriculture in the Midde West from 1850 to 1860, under a Democratic tariff, there was an increase of 41.7 per cent in the United States. From 1880 to 1890, under a Republican tariff, there was an increase of 21 per cent. Under Democratic tariff, railroad mileage from 1850 to 1860 increased from 10,982 miles to 30,626, an increase of nearly 300 per cent. From 1890 to 1900 the increase was from 166,703 miles to 194,262, or an increase of about 16¼ per cent.

The value of farms and farm property increased from 1850 to 1860 from $3,967,343,580 to $7,980,493,060, an increase of over 101 per cent. From 1880 to 1890 the increase was from $12,180,501,538 to $16,082,267,689, a little over 30 per cent. From 1890 to 1900 the increase was but a little over 20 per cent.

The value of farm animals increased between 1850 and 1860 over 100 per cent. Between 1880 and 1890 the increase was but 55 per cent; between 1890 and 1900 there was a decrease in value of $190,642,894.

Our exports increased from 1850 to 1860, 163 per cent. From 1880 to 1890 there was an increase of 2⅝ per cent. From 1890 to 1900 there was an increase of a little over 60 per cent; from 1900 to 1907, about 34 per cent.

In wealth we increased from 1850 to 1860, 125 per cent; from 1880 to 1890 the increase was 46 per cent; from 1890 to 1900 the increase was 37 per cent. The capital employed in manufacturing industries increased 89.4 per cent from 1850 to 1860; from 1890 to 1900 the increase was 50.7 per cent. From 1850 to 1860, under low tariff, rural wealth increased over 100 per cent; from 1890 to 1900, under high tariff, rural wealth increased but a little over 20 per cent. On the other hand, urban wealth doubled in every decade, except from 1880 to 1890 and from 1890 to 1900, when the increase was only 50 per cent. The average per capita wealth of the farmer remained the same from 1860 to 1900, yet that of the urbanite increased over sixfold. Of the $78,000,000,000 increase of national wealth from 1860 to 1900 but a little over one-fifth went to the farmers, who represent one-half of the population; yet of the $9,000,000,000 increase of wealth during the low-tariff decade of 1850 to 1860, over 44 per cent went to the farmers.

We are told in every campaign of the great increase in our national wealth under protection. This country is so situated and has such immense resources that its development and increase of wealth would be wonderful under any kind of tariff laws. We have fertile soil, inexhaustible mines of hidden wealth, and the most intelligent people on the globe. Prosperity is not produced by law. Prosperity comes through natural processes. It is not handed out by the President or by Congress. It comes by industry, fertility of the soil, and the intelligence of our people combined. Our country, with its broad and fertile plains, vast mines of mineral wealth, and enormous resources, will be prosperous and progressive.

Our farm property in 1850 represented one-half of our total wealth, in 1870 it represented but one-third, and to-day it is not equal to one-fifth.

We have immense wealth; the last showing was in the census report of 1904 and amounted to $107,104,211,917, yet 70 per cent of it was owned by 200,000 people, and the other 30 per cent was owned by the remaining 85,517,230 people of the country. It is said that when the directors of the United States Steel Trust meet one-twelfth of the total wealth of the country is represented around the directors' table. Five thousand men in this country actually own one-sixth of our entire national wealth, leaving the balance to be divided among the remaining 89,995,000 people.

The tariff has contributed more than all other things combined to produce this unequal distribution of wealth, stimulating, supporting, and producing trusts. These advantages are given by law. It is the duty of our party to change the system by which the money is taken by law from the man who earns it and given to the man who has not earned it. But we do not now have that power. The Senate and the President are still Republican, and the people do not expect us to control legislation. We can indicate along what lines we will legislate when given the power and authority. The people approve what we have already done and will extend our authority in the next election. We will then be able to enact laws along the lines of true Democracy. We will relieve the people from unjust and oppressive tariff taxes and receive the approval and plaudits of the American people. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT]. [Applause.]

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I am an old-fashioned Democrat. [Applause.] During the 16 years that I have been a Member of this House the House and the Senate have both been Republican, and all the important measures have been decided by a Republican majority. I came into the House in the Fifty-fourth Congress, and was a part of the flotsam that floated with the tide amid the general wreck of the Democratic Party following its failure to carry out its pledges and to properly reduce the tariff on Democratic principles as it had pledged the people in its platform in 1892 that it would do.

I was in the Fifty-fifth Congress when the Wilson bill was repealed and the Dingley bill was placed upon the statute books. Following the passage of the McKinley bill, the people who had been betrayed and had had put upon them a tariff which exceeded 52 per cent returned the Democratic Party to power upon declarations in a platform which rang throughout the country with denunciations of a tariff tax granting special privileges to a few at the expense of the many as a robbery under the form of law. The Democratic Party failing to redeem its pledges, the Republicans were returned to power in 1894. But still the demand of the people for reduced taxation was unheeded. Following the induction into power of the McKinley administration and the passage of the Dingley bill came the Spanish War. Yet even during that war, with the right of the soldiers in the field to vote, the people returned the Republican Party to power in this House by a majority of only 13.

As a result of all this, there came into being, as the offspring grown up under the fostering care of this protective tariff, innumerable trusts, until the condition of this country was almost as that described by Sir John Culpeper, in the House of Parliament, when he said:

> They are a nest of wasps—a swarm of vermin which have overcrept the land. Like the frogs of Egypt, they have gotten possession of our dwellings, and we have scarce a room free from them. They sup in our cup; they dip in our dish; they sit by our fire. We find them in the dye fat, washbowl, and powdering tub. They share with the butler in his box. They will not bait us a pin. We may not buy our clothes without their brokerage. These are the leeches that have sucked the Commonwealth so hard that it is almost hectical. Mr. Speaker, I have echoed to you the cries of the Kingdom. I will tell you their hopes. They look to Heaven for a blessing on this Parliament.

So it went on. The Republican Party, boasting of its power, with plethoric campaign chests and indifferent to the demands of the people, seemed to think that it could return itself to power as often as it wished. It built up a political machine—a veritable Frankenstein—which, like the Frankenstein of old, has destroyed its creator. Now the people, grown tired of the rule of the trusts under the Republican Party, tired of the exactions that have been made as the result of this unjust system of taxation, have again placed the Democratic Party in power in this Chamber, with the demand that we give them relief. I paraphrase the language of the great Englishman whom I have just quoted, uttered 300 years ago, when our forefathers were suffering by reason of the exactions of the favored few:

Mr. Chairman, we have echoed to you the cries of this Republic, and we will tell you what the hopes of the American people are: They look to Heaven for a blessing on this Congress; that this Democratic House may pass a bill, and that the Republican Senate may be forced to accept a bill, which will give heed to the demands of the people of the entire country for freedom from the extortions that have existed under a Republican tariff. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, I said that I am an old-fashioned Democrat, and I am. I do not believe in exercising the power of the General Government to levy taxes upon the people except for revenue; and while I would raise all the revenue necessary to carry on the Government, administered economically and justly, I would not levy a dollar for protection or to give aid or preference to one class or section over another.

But the demand for the reduction of the tariff duties and the abandonment of the high protection duties has grown stronger and stronger, until to-day the hour is fixed for the abandonment of the high protective tariff and a return to the principle of a tariff for revenue only.

The American system of Henry Clay only proposed a duty of 25 per cent, and of this system Mr. Webster in 1824 said:

> Sir, that is the true American policy which shall most fully employ American capital and labor and best sustain the whole population. With me it is a fundamental axiom; it is interwoven with my opinions; the greatest interests of the country are united and inseparable; agriculture, commerce, and manufacturing will prosper together or languish together; and that all legislation is dangerous which proposes to benefit one of these without looking to consequences which may fall on the others.

It may not be amiss to recall what Mr. Andrew Carnegie said upon this subject in 1908, and I read the following from the hearing before the Ways and Means Committee of the House:

> * * * There is no doubt about this; but, on the other hand, I have been led to the conclusion that conditions have changed so greatly in the interval that the tariff should now be viewed from a new standpoint.
> The writer assumes that a decided majority of our voters are agreed—
> First. That it is advisable for new countries to encourage capital by protective duties when seen to be necessary to develop new industries.
> Second. That after full and exhaustive trials, if success be not finally attained, such protection should cease, except as noted hereunder.

Third. That should the experiment succeed, protection becomes unnecessary, and should steadily but gradually be abolished, provided that the home supply of any article absolutely necessary for the national safety shall not thereby be endangered.

So much for the doctrine of protection. That there is a cult who regard that doctrine as sacrosanct and everlasting, none knows better than the writer; but its members are few and not likely to increase, since our country has admittedly developed and gained and is to continue gaining manufacturing supremacy in one department after another until it reaches a position where free trade in manufactures would be desirable for it, all the markets of the world open to her, and hers to the world. Our difficulty will then be to get other nations to agree to free trade.

There will remain importations of foreign luxuries, which should be still heavily taxed for revenue, not protection; the aim being to levy the tax that would produce the greatest revenue from luxuries. This would not seriously affect the producer since the buyer pays all duties, and demand would not be greatly affected by the higher price, since only the rich use them.

In conclusion, a "tariff for protection," which was the issue 40 years ago, should now give place to a "tariff for revenue," and therefore the strict maintenance of the present duties upon foreign luxuries paid by the rich. * * *

According to the reports of importations during the fiscal year 1910 the duties, ad valorem, levied under the present tariff laws amount to 41.92 per cent upon the dutiable importations. It is to relieve the consumers and farmers of this country that the Democratic majority has reported, and proposes to pass this bill, and to place upon the free list as many of the necessaries of life as can be done now, keeping in mind the demands of the Government for revenue. I believe, Mr. Chairman—the power to tax being the power to destroy—that Mr. Justice Miller, of the Supreme Court of the United States, laid down the correct doctrine of taxation applicable, most of all, to this kind of taxation, when he said:

To lay with one hand the power of the Government on the property of the citizen and with the other to bestow it upon favored individuals to aid private enterprise and build up private fortune is none the less robbery because it is done under the form of law and called "taxation." This is not taxation, but it is a decree under legislative forms.

There is nothing of a public nature any more entitling the manufacturer to public gifts than the sailor, the farmer, or the lumberman. Our Government is based upon equality of rights. All honest employments are honorable. The State can not rightfully discriminate among occupations, for discrimination in favor of one branch or one industry is discrimination adverse to all other branches. The State is equally to protect all, giving no undue advantage or special and exclusive preference to any.

No public exigency can require private spoliation for the private benefit of favored individuals. If the citizen is protected in his property by the Constitution against the public, much more is he against private rapacity.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, the rule which has guided me in determining my vote upon tariff questions is based upon the following principles which were announced in the report made by that great Secretary of the Treasury, Robert J. Walker, in 1846, when, following his lead, the Democrats passed a tariff bill of which it has been said by one of the most distinguished Republicans who ever served in this House or the Senate:

The tariff of 1846, although confessedly and professedly a tariff for revenue, was, so far as regards all the great interests of the country, as perfect a tariff as any we have ever had.

That was uttered in 1872 by Senator Allison, of Iowa, who, after long and faithful service, has been gathered to his fathers. The principle for which he contended and the thought which he suggested found abundant seed and abundant harvest in Iowa, and Iowa to-day presents men, both in this House and in the Senate, obedient to the will of the majority of the people, who have endeavored, and I apprehend will continue to endeavor, to reduce the burdens of the people, so far as tariff taxation is concerned, to the point where we shall have a tariff for revenue under an economical administration. The principles which guide me, Mr. Chairman, in my determination are briefly as follows:

First. That no more money should be collected than is necessary for the wants of the Government, economically administered.

Second. That no duty be imposed on any article above the lowest rate which will yield the largest amount of revenue.

Third. That below such rates discrimination may be made, descending in the scale of duties, or, for imperative reasons, the article may be placed in the list of those free from all duty.

Fourth. That the maximum revenue duty should be imposed on luxuries.

Fifth. That all minimums and all specific duties should be abolished and ad valorem duties substituted in their place, care being taken to guard against fraudulent invoices and undervaluation and to assess the duty upon the actual market value.

Sixth. That the duty should be so imposed as to operate as equally as possible throughout the Union, discriminating neither for nor against any class or section.

If these principles do not represent Democratic doctrine, then in the long years that I have studied and endeavored to find out what they are I have failed.

Now, we hear a good deal about the reduction of the tariff by the Democrats. It has been outlined so far as this House is concerned. President Taft himself in August, 1910, wrote a letter to the chairman of the Republican campaign committee (although he had said in 1908 at Winona that this was the best tariff ever passed before by a Republican Congress) stating that when Congress met there should be a reduction of the tariff, schedule by schedule; and before this extra session ends we expect, so far as the majority in this House is concerned, to follow the plan which was outlined by the Chief Executive and give him an opportunity to approve it.

When we come here to carry out the demands of the people for a reduction of the tariff; when we come to comply with the demands of a Republican President that a reciprocity agreement between Canada and the United States shall be ratified, the purpose of which is to reduce the cost of living, and starting out in this direction by offering this free list, which will lift $300,000,000 from the backs of the toiling consumers of this country, what are we confronted with? Nothing but carp and criticism. I do not mean that the other side has criticized in a manly and statesmanlike manner, but, rather, has it been a technical, lower-court-lawyer criticism. Where has my distinguished friend from Illinois, or any other of those who have claimed to be such constructive statesmen, offered any valid suggestions? When I heard my friend from Illinois and others on that side refer to the benefits of the Dingley law and to the benefits of the Payne-Aldrich law, both of which have finally been repudiated at the polls, and heard this criticism of the verbiage and rhetoric of this bill, there came often into my mind the words of the poet:

Oh, ye wha' are sae gud yoursel',
Sae pious and sae holy,
Ye've naught to do but mark and tell
Your nebours' faults and folly.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

Why, my friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN], who is generally so frank, so sincere, and so manly, instead of striking open blows at this free list, instead of taking the position that the farmer should be relieved of a tax upon his agricultural implements, upon his cotton bagging and ties, upon his plows and his hoes, upon his salt and upon his lumber, brought into play the expert capacity of an expert, critical lawyer, and undertook to split hairs, making such distinctions as—

A hair to divide
Twixt south and southwest tide.

Now, just a word in regard to agricultural implements. I would fail in my duty if I did not call attention to some things with reference to agricultural implements. We put them upon the free list. Of course, an agricultural implement is an agricultural implement; and because we have not called in and sought the advice of tariff experts, as the Republicans did when they made their tariff bill, when they called in men whose duty it is not to express what you mean, but to conceal what you mean, they term this failure upon our part "awkward, indifferent, and clumsy." For my part I would rather be called awkward and clumsy, and have my efforts bring relief to the American people from the exactions of the tariff than to have a law nicely and technically constructed, but which would be found hereafter to give no relief at all. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, Mr. H. E. Miles, who is the chairman of the tariff committee of the Manufacturers' Association and who is a manufacturer of agricultural implements, selling them all over the world, and selling them abroad cheaper than he sells them at home, testified before the Ways and Means Committee as follows:

I have made money every year out of the tariff graft. Not much, but still a little. The tariff barons raised their price $50,000 to me. I made a charge against the jobber of $60,000, and I know that he charged more than $70,000 for the $60,000 he paid me. Before reaching the consumer the $50,000 charges became about $100,000, to be paid by the agricultural consumer.

The manufacturer who would prosper must make a double profit—one by the shrewd management of his business and another by still shrewder manipulation in Washington.

We have no great difficulty in shopping abroad, for we could get as high prices as at home. We are so held up, however, by our supply people that to most of us there is very scant profit in foreign business.

When Congress gave us 45 per cent, we needing only 20 per cent, they gave us a congressional permit, if not an invitation, to consolidate, form one great trust and advance our prices 25 per cent, being the difference between the 20 per cent needed and the 45 per cent given.

And if, by putting agricultural implements upon the free list, we can stop this admitted tariff graft, we are willing to be general and not too specific.

But, particularly, Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention to the question of cotton bagging and ties. Before I do that, however, I want to say that the cotton farmer of the South does not ask nor demand the enactment of tariff laws for protection at the hands of the General Government.

All he wants is a fair rate of duty, laying fairly the taxes that the burdens may be equal, and he demands no discrimination shall be made against him in favor of others. The cotton crop of the South in 1910 brought back $400,000,000 to $600,000,000 a year from abroad in gold from the sale of the raw product. I will add, that but for the sale of the raw product of the cotton farmer for the last six or seven years or more the difference between the exports and the imports of the country would have been not in our favor, but in favor of the old world. It is the cotton planter who raises the crop through all sorts of trials and difficulties, through rain and sunshine, through storm and calm, through all sorts of demands made upon him, who has enabled, not only himself, but the entire country to prosper. Last year he brought back into the country $600,000,000 surplus from the sale of the raw product, and what are we taxed for that? The western farmer had his free binding twine. The western farmer, when he exports his grain in bags made out of imported materials, has a drawback of 99 per cent.

We are told that the price of cotton is so high that we can afford to be robbed. Just think of it—that the price of cotton has been so high during a Republican administration that we ought not to object when the Bagging and Tie Trust rob us! The price of cotton, I will say in passing, was lower in 1898, under a Republican administration, than it ever has been in the history of the world except in the year 1840. I think it did go down to something below 5 cents or 4½ cents in 1898. These Republicans undertake to say, because the price of cotton has advanced to 14½ and 15 cents now—although there are 18,000,000 bales demanded for the consumption of the world and the South can raise only between eleven and twelve million bales to satisfy that demand—that they have produced the increased price!

Now, let us see what the tariff has added to the coffers of the Bagging Trust. The tariff has added $5,500,000 to our taxes in the last five years. During that time we raised 61,311,000 bales of cotton and used 429,177 running yards of bagging, or 524,000,000 square yards. The average price was so much, and the duty per square yard was six-tenths of a cent. On the bagging alone we paid to the Bagging Trust $3,147,296, or about 5 cents a bale.

For cotton ties, with the duty for a while at five-tenths cent a pound and afterwards three-tenths cent a pound, we have paid $2,300,000 in the five years, or, as I have said, we have paid this Cotton Bagging Trust $5,000,000 in five years.

Now, let us see. Under the Payne bill jute and jute butts, out of which cotton bagging is made, come in free; but the manufacture of butts into material proper to make cotton bagging is a manufacturing process known only in India and not used in this country. The materials are obtained free. Nearly 30 years ago a man named Marshall, the pioneer in this country who introduced cotton bagging into the United States and manufactured the first jute bagging ever manufactured in this country, appeared before the Ways and Means Committee and declared, in answer to a question propounded by Mr. McKinley, that a duty of 15 per cent on bagging was a sufficient protection, provided jute came in free. The McKinley bill placed the duty at something in excess of that amount. That was in the Forty-eighth Congress—nearly 30 years ago—so that from that time down to the present the manufacturers of bagging have had protection under a tariff varying from 15 to 22 per cent. This infant industry has had jute butts free and a duty on cotton bagging in addition—with the exception of the period from 1894 to 1897—and to this day a discrimination is made between the southern farmer and the western farmer, in that the western farmer has his binding twine free with which he binds his grain and the cotton farmer, who brings into the country millions of dollars, is taxed for the material he uses in baling his cotton.

In the last Congress I introduced a bill undertaking to have cotton bagging and ties placed on the free list. The Senate passed an amendment to the bill and placed cotton bagging on the free list, but the provision was stricken out in conference at the instance and insistence of the Ludlow people, in Massachusetts, who are a part of the Bagging Trust, as I will endeavor to show if I have the time.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. BARTLETT. I will yield for a question; yes.

Mr. GILLETT. I would like to ask the gentleman why he called the Ludlow Manufacturing Co. the Bagging Trust?

Mr. BARTLETT. I have called it that because I have evidence here, which I will put into the RECORD, showing that they bought up and dismantled cotton-bagging mills in Galveston, Tex., and other towns in the South, and that the stock of the Ludlow Co. was issued to the men whose mills were dismantled, and those men hold that stock to-day.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield again?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield?

Mr. BARTLETT. I can not yield.

Mr. GILLETT. I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. BARTLETT. The testimony I have in my hand is more reliable than the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. GILLETT. The gentleman has not any testimony that will show that the Ludlow Co. had anything to do with such an operation.

Mr. BARTLETT. But I have the testimony.

Mr. GILLETT. The gentleman is mistaken; that is all.

Mr. BARTLETT. Why, I have it.

Mr. GILLETT. I should like to see it.

Mr. BARTLETT. All right. I have it right here:

Some years ago there were several independent——

Mr. GILLETT. The gentleman spoke of the Ludlow Manufacturing Co. Now he is going to read——

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I have tried to be courteous, and I insist that the gentleman shall not interrupt me in that way.

Mr. GILLETT. I wish to be courteous, too.

Mr. BARTLETT. Well, you are not.

Mr. GILLETT. I knew you did not want to make a misstatement.

Mr. BARTLETT. I am not going to make a misstatement, and the gentleman's incorrect correction can not correct what he calls a misstatement.

Mr. GILLETT. I should like to hear you read anything about the Ludlow Co. being in that operation you spoke of. I do not believe you will find it.

Mr. BARTLETT. Listen to this.

The American makers say they are three in number, consisting of the American Manufacturing Co., the Ludlow Manufacturing Associates, of Boston, and the Peru Bagging Co.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GILLETT. You will find it was not the Ludlow Co.

Mr. BARTLETT. Now, Mr. Chairman, I insist that for the gentleman to take my time in this way is not courteous. I will read a letter on the subject. Not only that, but the testimony was before the committee that these people themselves admitted that they dismantled the mill at Galveston and issued the stock of the Galveston concern to the people who represent the Ludlow and American companies.

Mr. GILLETT. My friend——

Mr. BARTLETT. I do not yield now. The gentleman must content himself with that.

Not only that, Mr. Chairman, but, not satisfied with the duty imposed by the customs authorities of six-tenths of a cent a yard on bagging, the manufacturers of bagging in this country appealed from that and endeavored to get a duty of 45 per cent ad valorem imposed, and I have a letter, to which I will call attention, and I think it will point pretty straight to this combination known as the Bagging Trust. They presented a fake case before the customs officials—the most remarkable case in the history of the country. They imported bagging made not entirely out of jute butts, but partly out of jute butts, partly out of Norwegian tow, and partly out of cotton waste.

The customs officials taxed it at six-tenths of a cent a yard; and the most remarkable thing was that the importer appealed from the decision of the customs officials and demanded that they tax the bagging at 45 per cent ad valorem under section 358, instead of six-tenths of a cent a yard under section 355 of the Payne bill. I have a letter here from a reputable man, which I will read if I have the time, stating that the same people, whom I charge to be in the Bagging Trust, took that bagging and carried it to Canada and had it imported at the port of Boston, Mass., for the purpose of increasing the rate from six-tenths of a cent per yard to 45 per cent ad valorem. I have here a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury referring me to that decision which I print in full. The Government was so dissatisfied with the decision that they have appealed it to the Commerce Court to have that decision reversed. And these are the people who now endeavor to stand in the way of having this onerous and prohibitive tariff tax removed—not that the Government may obtain revenue, but that they, the Bagging Trust, may continue to extort from the cotton farmer exorbitant prices.

Not a trust! Why, does the gentleman deny that steel ties are made by the Steel Trust?

Mr. Chairman, I will read or incorporate with my remarks in the RECORD the documents to show the statements that I make to be true. By proofs and admissions, and statement of witnesses under oath, and of reputable gentlemen not under oath, I will show that the Ludlow Co. and the American Co. are trusts, engaged in the manufacture of bagging, and show that they and the other members of that trust yearly extort from the people who raise cotton—unnecessarily and improperly—nearly $1,000,000 for bagging. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I will confront them with the proof; I will submit it in the RECORD; proof so indisputable that it will be as clearly proved to be a trust as the Steel Trust that manufactures the steel ties. No man will have the effrontery to deny that the steel ties are made by the Steel Trust.

Another thing: It is said that we get returns for our ties and bagging when we sell the cotton; that we are paid so much a pound for the ties and bagging. That is the same old story. Those who have on this floor advocated free cotton ties and bagging have had to meet it for years.

I will prove it absolutely to be a fact by men who know, that there is deducted on every bale of cotton exported 6 per cent, and there is deducted from every bale of cotton for domestic consumption 5 per cent for tare. They allow 22 pounds by agreement, enforced by the Massachusetts Mill Association; and if perchance cotton bagging and ties go to 28 or 29 or 30 pounds, then, instead of being paid for our cotton bagging and ties, they deduct 29 pounds. I say without fear of contradiction that the southern farmer does not receive pay per pound for his cotton bagging and ties.

I have abundant proof of that here, and I am prepared to give full information on the subject, if my time were not limited. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I left?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has consumed 35 minutes.

Mr. BARTLETT. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to read a statement as to the value of raw-cotton exports and of gold production:

In the years from 1900 to 1909, the raw-cotton exports of the world were $3,650,577,273. [Applause.]

In 10 years the South's raw cotton brought back in gold or credits to the United States more than $3,650,000,000, to which in the total credited to this staple should be added many millions of dollars returned in exchange for exports of manufactured cotton and of cotton-seed products.

Each year this country would be debtor to Europe and the whole world but for these men striving to arise from desolation and ruin amid the ashes of their homes and smokeless chimneys, men who for 40 years have girded up their loins and marched onward, undaunted by misfortune, unterrified by unheard-of and indescribable local conditions, until to-day they stand before the country and the world, not only as the men who of this great Republic are of true American blood and true American principle, but the men who have preserved, made, and will preserve and make the prosperity of our common country substantial and lasting. [Applause.] I know them well, Mr. Chairman, and for many years I have endeavored to aid in the passage of some law that would lighten their burdens from these unnecessary taxes. I would lift them up by letting them understand that the American Congress does not make any distinction between the man that raises cotton and the man that raises wheat. [Applause.] As evidence of the value of the cotton crop, I call attention to the following, taken from the Manufacturers' Record:

Value of raw cotton exports and of gold production.

In 10 years the South's raw cotton brought back in gold or credits to the United States more than $3,650,000,000, to which, in the total credited to this staple, should be added many millions of dollars returned in exchange for exports of manufactured cotton and of cotton-seed products.

COTTON BAGGING AND TIES.

This bill proposes to admit free of duty bagging for cotton, gunny cloth, and all similar fabrics, materials, or coverings, suitable for covering and baling cotton, composed in whole or in part of jute, jute butts, hemp, flax, seg, Russian seg, New Zealand tow, Norwegian tow, aloe, mill waste, cotton tares, or any other materials or fibers suitable for covering cotton.

The rate on cotton bagging under the Payne-Aldrich bill is six-tenths of a cent per square yard, and it has been at that rate of duty since the enactment of the Dingley law, which amounts to 15 per cent ad valorem.

The manufacture of bagging for the covering of cotton was first introduced in this country by a man named Marshall, who in the Forty-eighth Congress appeared before the Ways and Means Committee and stated that a duty of 15 per cent ad valorem would be a sufficient duty and furnish all the protection that the industry then needed. In spite of that testimony, the tariff in the McKinley bill was placed at 1.6 cents per square yard, which amounted to an ad valorem duty of 32 per cent. Now, after 30 years of protection, it is said that this duty should not be removed from this necessary and important article, so far as the cotton raisers are concerned, but that they should still be compelled to pay tribute to the Cotton Bagging Trust.

At the opening of the present session I introduced bills to admit free of duty cotton bagging and ties, and the provisions of these bills are substantially incorporated in the pending measure.

WHAT THE TARIFF ON COTTON BAGGING AND TIES COSTS THE FARMER.

The following table shows the amount paid by the cotton farmers during the past five years by reason of the duty on cotton bagging and ties. This does not take into consideration the increase in the price by reason of the absence of competition and the control of the sale of these articles by the Bagging Trust and the Steel Trust:

This table shows the number of bales produced, the amount of bagging and ties used, and the duty upon them. It will show that the tariff has added to the burden of the cotton planters for the past five years over $5,500,000, which is the duty—$3,147,296 on bagging, combined with that on ties, $2,353,761.

TIES.

The duty on cotton ties is virtually prohibitive. The manufacture and sale are controlled by the Steel Trust—chiefly by the Carnegie Steel Co. and the Pittsburg Steel Co., which companies fix the price.

The following table will show what importations were made and the duty collected during the years stated:

COTTON BAGGING.

The importations of cotton bagging for the years stated in the following table will show that in no one year has there been imported as much as one-fifth of the cotton bagging used in covering the cotton crop. Take the year 1910. There was used for that year's crop 102,666,660 square yards of bagging, whereas the imports from all countries only amounted to 16,505,542 square yards.

Fiscal year ended June 30—	Rate of duty.	Quantity.	Value.	Duty collected.	Average.

1910	do	16,505,542.00	699,940.00	99,033.28	.042	14.15

These tables will show that while it required nearly 103,000,000 square yards of bagging for the cotton crop of 1910, there were imported only 16,000,000 square yards, and while it required 106,000,000 pounds of cotton ties, there were imported only 500,000 pounds of cotton ties.

The duty collected by the Government on cotton bagging for 1910 was $99,000 and that upon ties was $1,498; so that the amount of revenue that the Government receives from the imposition of this duty is insignificant, while the amount exacted from the cotton planter for the year 1910 upon those two articles amounted to fully a million dollars, which finds its way into the coffers of the Bagging Trust and the Steel Trust.

There has not been any excuse for the retention of the duty, and justice to the farmers demands its repeal.

From an examination of the foregoing tables it will appear that the duty imposed is almost prohibitive, and that the revenue derived by the Government is insignificant compared with the immense amount of money returned to this country from the exportation and sale of raw cotton abroad.

According to the evidence of those who have information upon this subject, there was used in the marketing of the crop of cotton each year for the past five years an average of 105,000,000 square yards, all of which is manufactured in this country except about 16,000,000 square yards.

An examination of the testimony before the Ways and Means Committee in 1908 will show that the manufacture of cotton bagging in the United States is controlled entirely by three companies, who have an agreement amongst themselves which virtually makes them a trust; and while they may not be technically a trust such as to bring them within the pale of the law against trusts and combinations, yet they have an agreement between themselves which is the same so far as the sale and price fixed for cotton bagging are concerned.

But it is said that the manufacture and sale of cotton bagging is not controlled by a trust. And does the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] deny that the Ludlow Manufacturing Associates is in any sense a trust? No one has yet been heard to challenge the assertion that those engaged in the manufacture and sale of cotton ties are associated with the Steel Trust. So I shall proceed to show who controls the manufacture and sale of cotton bagging in this country.

The statement of Mr. C. Lee McMillan, made to the Ways and Means Committee of this House in 1908, is as follows:

The American makers, say, three in number, consisting of the American Manufacturing Co., of New York; the Ludlow Manufacturing Associates, of Boston; and the Peru Bagging Manufacturing Co., of Peru, Ind., own and control every mill in America now engaged in making new bagging for cotton.

The first two corporations agree at the beginning of each season upon a price to open the market at, and the small Peru company follows. An arbitrary list, showing differentials throughout the entire cotton belt, is strictly followed, and the price named any given point by the American Manufacturing Co. is exactly same as the one quoted same point by the Ludlow company.

Some years ago there were several independent mills engaged in this business, but the ones now surviving managed to drive the others entirely out by selling bagging below price at which the independents could make same at, and in the end the American Manufacturing Co. bought such independent mills as the one in New Orleans, in Louisville, Ky., and in Galveston, Tex., and then dismantled same, shipped such machinery as was wanted to Brooklyn and St. Louis and breaking up and selling for scrap the balance of the machinery. I think that the same process was followed when the American Manufacturing Co. bought out their New York and Brooklyn rivals. When additional machinery has been required by the Americans, they have either had it made in this country or they bought it second hand in Dundee and imported same free of duty.

There can be no doubts about the profits of the above-named concerns being very large—see how they have grown—and I ask you to take into consideration the great amount of low-grade jute butts and the vast amount of second-hand jute bagging they buy and make into yarns when you compare their cost with that of the Calcutta maker, who uses a much higher quality of raw material.

In a letter to me, dated May 6, 1911, Mr. McMillan says:

Each year both of these concerns (The American Manufacturing Co. and the Ludlow Co.) open the market upon the same day, and both ask the same identical prices for the same quality of goods to every point they trade with. The same plan as the above is carried out by the Carnegie Steel Co. and the Pittsburg Steel Co. in the sale of cotton ties.

Mr. R. Rochester, of New York, N. Y., made the following statement before the Ways and Means Committee on November 28, 1908:

Every yard of bagging used to cover the cotton crop of the United States is made by the American Manufacturing Co., 65 Wall Street, and the Ludlow Manufacturing Co., at Ludlow, Mass., which concerns have the country districted, the American selling 82 per cent and the Ludlow 18 per cent, at an agreed price.

This business has been going on for many years, the two concerns in question having gradually crushed out or absorbed all others who attempted to make bagging.

They are protected by a tariff to such an extent that it keeps out the Dundee and Calcutta bagging. For it has been the rule for many years that whenever a consignment of any foreign bagging would come in the combination (American and Ludlow) would promptly lower their prices in the market to which the foreign bagging came to a point below the cost of the foreign bagging, and would so advertise the fact and intimidate the trade as to discourage further importations.

In addition to the above combination between the American and Ludlow they also maintain a chain of brokers or so-called dealers throughout the country who, though posing as independent, are in fact emissaries of these concerns, keeping them advised at all times of the conditions in the various markets regarding the status of foreign bagging, etc., and with suggestions as to "all the traffic will bear."

But we are not confined to the testimony of third parties. The following statement was made before the Ways and Means Committee of this House, in 1908, by Mr. Thomas F. Magner, the representative of the manufacturers of jute cloth from jute butts:

STATEMENT OF THOMAS F. MAGNER, WHO REPRESENTS MANUFACTURERS OF JUTE CLOTH FROM JUTE BUTTS.

MONDAY, November 30, 1908.

The CHAIRMAN. On what subject do you appear?

Mr. MAGNER. Cotton bagging.

The CHAIRMAN. Please proceed.

Mr. MAGNER. I represent, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, all those manufacturers who are engaged in the manufacture of what is known as jute cloth made from jute butts in the United States. They are the Peru Bagging Manufacturing Co., of Indiana; the Ludlow Manufacturing Associates, of Ludlow, Mass.; and the American Manufacturing Co. The Ludlow Associates have a large plant, 30 acres in extent, at Ludlow, Mass. The American Manufacturing Co. have different plants, several plants in St. Louis, one at Galveston, one at Charleston, and they have two large plants in Brooklyn, New York City, my native city.

We present here to-day from all of these manufacturers a memorial. We have now in process of preparation, and later will present to the committee, a table giving the relative cost of production of this fiber, of the manufactured article, in India and in America, the amount produced, and everything relating to it, both in the production and manufacture in Calcutta and in the United States.

The memorial referred to was signed as follows:

The American Manufacturing Co., by John M. Maury, assistant secretary.
Ludlow Manufacturing Associates, by Charles W. Hubbard, treasurer.
Penn Bagging Manufacturing Co., Max W. Kraus, secretary-treasurer.

So that whenever you find one of these three corporations who manufacture and sell cotton bagging, whether before the committees of Congress, endeavoring to prevent a reduction of duty or to have it increased—in the world of trade, or in the market fixing the prices, or endeavoring to destroy competition—you will find them in company, acting in concert, through the same agents and attorneys, and pursuing the same course and methods as other trusts and combinations do and have done.

A few days ago a Member of this House from a cotton-raising State received a telegram from citizens of his State stating that they were stockholders in a bagging factory, and asking him to oppose putting cotton bagging on the free list. Upon inquiry as to where that factory was located, he received the reply that 14 years ago the bagging factory in a Southern State had been abandoned and closed, and that all the stockholders had now the same interest in the American Manufacturing Co.; that is, that the stockholders in the southern mill which had been discontinued now owned the same number of shares in the American Manufacturing Co.

This bears out the statement made by Mr. McMillan before the Ways and Means Committee in 1908, which was as follows:

Some years ago there were several independent mills engaged in this business, but the ones now surviving managed to drive the others entirely out by selling bagging below price at which the independents could make same at, and in the end the American Manufacturing Co. bought such independent mills as the one in New Orleans, in Louisville, Ky., and in Galveston, Tex., and then dismantled same, shipped such machinery as was wanted to Brooklyn and St. Louis, and breaking up and selling for scrap the balance of the machinery.

But these manufacturers of cotton bagging are not engaged solely in the business of manufacturing cotton bagging. To show that they are engaged in the manufacture of other articles and that the removal of the duty on cotton bagging will not materially injure them, I read the following letter from Mr. McMillan, of New Orleans:

C. LEE MCMILLAN & CO. (LTD.),
New Orleans, April 18, 1911.

HON. CHAS. L. BARTLETT,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Doubtless the American Bagging Trust will endeavor by some means to convince the Finance Committee of the Senate that free cotton bagging will cause all of its mills to close.

Regarding same, you may state, without fear of contradiction, that said trust, in the manufacture of the bagging it now sells the cotton farmer, uses, in part, many kinds of second-hand bagging, bagging waste, and what is called "bear grass"—all of these as cheap substitutes for jute butts.

By the use of the above-named articles the trust mills will always be able to compete with foreign-made bagging.

Please refer to Tariff Hearings, afternoon session, Committee on Ways and Means, November 30, 1908, and you will read statement of Mr. Thomas F. Magner, who represented the trust before said hearing, and you will see that the American Manufacturing Co., in addition to making bagging, are among the largest producers of sisal and manila rope, also cordage.

The Ludlow Manufacturing Associates also have much to do outside of making bagging, as you will see by above-mentioned statement, viz:

Department 1 manufactures twines		pounds	11,000,000
Department 2 manufactures hemp carpet yarns	do		3,500,000
Department 3 manufactures jute carpet yarns	do		36,000,000
Department 4 manufactures upholsterers' webbing	do		1,800,000
Department 5 manufactures bagging for cotton		yards	25,000,000
Department 6 manufactures cordage		pounds	6,200,000

Respectfully submitted.

C. LEE MCMILLAN & CO. (LTD.),
By C. LEE MCMILLAN, President.

I have called attention to the fact that the western farmer who raises grain has for many years had the duty removed from binding twine used by him in the harvesting of his grain. Another advantage afforded by the Dingley tariff law and the Payne tariff law is the drawback provision, which provides for the refunding of 99 per cent of the duty paid upon imported goods which are in whole or in part used in the manufacture of goods which can be exported. Under this provision there is returned to the importer 99 per cent of the duty paid on burlaps or other material out of which the sacks or bags used by the farmers of the West in sacking or bagging their grain for export are made. No such privilege or benefit is granted to the southern farmer who may use imported bagging to export his cotton, or bagging made from imported material in which his cotton is baled.

HOW THE TRUST SEEKS TO INCREASE THE PRICE OF COTTON BAGGING.

I desire now to show that the cotton-bagging manufacturers of the country, not satisfied with the duty provided for on cotton bagging in section 355, have endeavored to increase the rate of duty to 45 per cent. This is manifested by the decision of the customs appraisers, a copy of which has been furnished me by the Secretary of the Treasury, as will appear from the following correspondence:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, April 15, 1911.

HON. C. L. BARTLETT,
House of Representatives.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 10th instant, in which you request information in regard to the classification of cotton bagging, which you understand has until recently been assessed with duty under paragraph 355 of the tariff act at the rate of six-tenths of 1 cent per square yard, but is now assessed with duty at the rate of 45 per cent ad valorem.

In reply, I have to advise you that the paragraph referred to provides that bagging for cotton, gunny cloth, and similar fabrics, suitable for covering cotton, composed of single yarns made of jute, jute butts, or hemp, shall be assessed with duty at the rate of six-tenths of 1 cent per square yard.

The contention has been made by certain domestic interests that a great deal of bagging used for covering cotton is not composed in chief value of jute and is, therefore, properly dutiable under paragraph 358 of the tariff act at the rate of 45 per cent ad valorem; and protests were filed by importers at the ports of Boston and New York against the assessment of duty upon this merchandise at the rate of six-tenths of 1 cent per square yard, importers claiming that it was properly dutiable at the rate of 45 per cent ad valorem.

The Board of United States General Appraisers sustained the importers' protests, and I inclose herewith for your information copies of the board's decisions dated March 16, 1911 (T. D. 31401—G. A. 7187), and March 20, 1911 (T. D. 31403—G. A. 7189). You will observe that in these cases the Government challenges the jurisdiction of the board to review the action of the collector where the protest claimed a higher rate of duty, and I invite your attention to the department's letter of March 18, 1911 (T. D. 31397), requesting that the board's decision be reviewed by the United States Court of Customs Appeals.

The department has not as yet issued any instructions as to the classification of bagging for cotton composed in chief value of some other fiber than jute, but has this matter under consideration and expects at an early date to issue instructions upon the subject, and you will be duly advised as to the conclusion reached by the department in this regard.

By direction of the Secretary.
Respectfully,

JAMES F. CURTIS,
Assistant Secretary.

(T. D. 31401—G. A. 7187.)

Jurisdiction—Bagging for cotton not made of jute.

1. Jurisdiction of board: One purpose of the customs administrative act is to secure the accurate and truthful classification of imported merchandise.

2. Idem: Where such merchandise has been improperly classified by the collector and the importer expresses his dissatisfaction by filing a protest claiming the proper classification, the protest will not be dismissed on the ground that the rate claimed is greater than that assessed by the collector.

3. Motive not subject to challenge: The motive of the importer in expressing his dissatisfaction will not be inquired into by the board.

4. Boards vested with judicial power: The authority conferred on the several boards of United States general appraisers to hear and determine all cases and questions involved in ascertaining such classification is a judicial power, and carries with it the authority to take testimony of witnesses, to ascertain the materials of which the merchandise is composed, to correct errors of the collector, and assign the importation to the proper paragraph of the tariff act, in accordance with the claim made in the protest, if sufficiently definite and distinct and found to be correct.

5. Cotton bagging not made of jute or hemp: Cotton bagging, although suitable for covering cotton, which is made in chief value of vegetable fibers, as aloe, Russian seg, and other fibers than jute, jute butts, or hemp, is dutiable at 45 per cent ad valorem under paragraph 358, tariff act of 1909, and not under paragraph 355 of said act.

United States general appraisers, New York, March 16, 1911.

In the matter of protest 444624 of L. H. A. Schwartz & Co. against the assessment of duty by the collector of customs at the port of Boston.

Before board 3 (Waite, Somerville, and Hay, general appraisers).

Somerville, general appraiser: The importation consists of new bagging, which is used for baling cotton. It was assessed for duty at 0.6 of 1 cent per square yard under paragraph 355 of the tariff act of 1909, which reads as follows:

"355. Bagging for cotton, gunny cloth, and similar fabrics, suitable for covering cotton, composed of single yarns made of jute, jute butts, or hemp, not bleached, dyed, colored, stained, painted, or printed, not exceeding 16 threads to the square inch, counting the warp and filling, and weighing not less than 15 ounces per square yard, six-tenths of 1 cent per square yard."

The importers claim that the goods are properly dutiable at 45 per cent ad valorem under paragraph 358 of said act, which provides as follows:

"358. All woven articles, finished or unfinished, and all manufactures of flax, hemp, ramie, or other vegetable fiber, or of which these substances, or any of them, is the component material of chief value, not specially provided for in this section, 45 per cent ad valorem."

It is admitted and is otherwise apparent that the rate of duty claimed by the importers to be the proper one is higher than that at which the goods were actually assessed by the collector. This presents a somewhat anomalous condition.

The first question raised at the hearing was one of jurisdiction. Counsel for the Government moved that the protest be dismissed for want of jurisdiction, because it appears that the rate claimed is higher than the rate assessed, and that the importers therefore have suffered no pecuniary damage in any way by the action of the collector and can have no substantial standing before the board. The jurisdiction of the board in customs cases is derived from subsection 14 of section 28 of the tariff act of 1909. It is there provided—

"That the decision of the collector as to the rate and amount of duties chargeable upon imported merchandise * * * shall be final and conclusive against all persons interested therein, unless the owner, importer, consignee, or agent of such merchandise * * * shall within 15 days after, * * * if dissatisfied with such decision, give notice in writing to the collector, setting forth therein distinctly and specifically, and in respect to each entry or payment, the reasons for his objections thereto, and if the merchandise is entered for consumption shall pay the full amount of the duties and charges ascertained to be due thereon."

It is provided that—

"Upon such notice and payment the collector shall transmit the invoice and all the papers and exhibits connected therewith to the board of nine general appraisers, for due assignment and determination as hereinbefore provided; such determination shall be final and conclusive upon all persons interested therein." * * *

Subsection 12 of said section 28 provides that—

"* * * Each of the boards of three general appraisers, or a majority thereof, shall have full power to hear and determine all cases and questions arising therein or assigned thereto." * * *

The protest in this case was duly transmitted by the collector to the board of nine general appraisers, and was properly assigned for hearing to this board, designated as Board 3.

We may state by way of preliminary consideration the principles adjudged by the courts as governing their jurisdiction and that of other judicial tribunals. Jurisdiction is commonly defined as authority to hear and determine a cause. As said by the Supreme Court in Illinois Central R. R. Co. v. Adams (180 U. S., 28, at p. 34)—

"Jurisdiction is the right to put the wheels of justice in motion and to proceed to the final determination of the cause upon the pleadings and the evidence."

The following principle, as stated by the Supreme Court in Reynolds v. Stockton (140 U. S., 254; 11 Sup. Ct. Rep., 773, 777), must be considered as well established: "Jurisdiction," said Mr. Justice Brewer, speaking for the court, "may be defined to be the right to adjudicate concerning the subject matter in the given case. To constitute this there are three essentials: First, the court must have cognizance of the class of cases to which the one to be adjudged belongs; second, the proper parties must be present; and third, the point decided must be, in substance and effect, within the issue."

It follows as a deduction from this definition that where there is jurisdiction of the person and of the subject matter the decision of all other questions arising in the case is but an exercise of that jurisdiction.

A board of three general appraisers, to which a case has been regularly assigned after transmittal by the collector, unquestionably is invested with the power to take testimony and to hear and decide all questions of which they properly have jurisdiction. This has been held by the courts to be the exercise of a judicial power, which is the function of a court. Marine, collector, v. Lyon (65 Fed. Rep., 992; 13 C. C. A., 268); Stone v. Whitridge (129 Fed. Rep., 33; 64 C. C. A., 47, 50; T. D. 25154). In United States v. Loeb (107 Fed. Rep., 692) it was held that when the collector transmitted the protest and other papers to the board, as required by statute, the jurisdiction of the board at once attached.

The question arises as to whether any legal reason exists why an importer can not claim that his goods shall be properly classified in accordance with the requirements of the tariff act because the rate claimed is higher than that assessed by the collector. It is settled that the object of filing a protest is to advise the collector what the error complained of is, "to enable him to correct it, if he deems it proper to do so." Sadler v. Maxwell (21 Fed. Cas., 136; 3 Blatch., 134). Article 1463 of the Customs Regulations of 1899 and article 1072, regulations 1908, and previous regulations have uniformly recognized this duty of collectors to review their action when protests are filed, and this practice is firmly established. No restriction seems to be placed upon the collector of customs which would prohibit him, before appeal taken, from revoking an erroneous classification and making a correct one, whether at a higher or lower rate of duty, with the single restriction that the time for reliquidation should be confined to one year from the time of entry. United States v. Phelps (27 Fed. Cas., 521; 17 Blatch., 312); United States v. Leng (18 Fed. Rep., 15). Act of 1874, 18 Stat., 190.

There seems to be no doubt of the fact that the collector could have reliquidated this entry and have corrected the classification in accordance with the claim of the protest, if the facts justified it in his judgment. Why should the board be debarred from exercising a similar power?

It is urged by counsel for the Government that the importers can not be supposed to be dissatisfied with an assessment at a lower rate of duty than that justified by law. In Loeb's case, cited supra, it was held not competent to investigate the motive of the collector as to whether he was dissatisfied or not with the value of the goods as appraised, and that the jurisdiction of the board could not be abrogated by proof to the contrary. We are clearly satisfied that the customs administrative act is designed to procure the proper classification of imported merchandise.

If an importer makes a proper claim for such classification of goods owned and imported by him, it can not be alleged that he has no interest in the suit. His pecuniary interest might suggest a different course, but his honesty of purpose, conscientious scruples, and integrity of character may dictate a policy of strict compliance with the requirements of the law. We might suppose a case of an importer dealing in goods which have been erroneously classified at a lower rate of duty making large contracts based upon their future sale, and being subsequently brought to financial ruin by a change in such classification liable to occur by the mutation in office of public officials holding different views. Moreover, an importer may expressly exert himself to procure the assessment of a higher rate of duty, if correct, upon imported merchandise in order to protect his interest against competition, the policy of tariff acts having been held to be to promote the various industries in this country by a system of protection against similar goods of foreign manufacture imported from abroad. Corroborative of this view is the provision in section 13 of said act, which provides that a collector may appeal to reappraisement so as to correct an erroneous valuation on imported goods on the condition that he deems the appraisement "too low." This provision would not authorize such appeal on the ground that the market value was found to be too high. Such an alternative is left to the importer. No such limitation occurs in the tariff act in providing for the proper classification of imported merchandise. It has been uniformly held by the board and the courts that a protest claiming a higher rate of duty than that assessed by the collector can be properly sustained. In re De Blois, G. A. 2413 (T. D. 14691); In re Sheldon & Co., G. A. 7116 (T. D. 31017); and Wakem v. United States (T. D. 25827).

We may further observe that if the board is debarred from assuming jurisdiction in cases of this character it would often be impossible to correct an assessment made on imported merchandise which is admitted and proved to be clearly erroneous, both as to the material entering into its composition and its tariff classification, although the importer seeks by protest to correct the error made by the collector and in the form prescribed by the customs administrative act. The blunder of the collector would remain uncorrected, although he or some other collector at a different port might see fit to classify similar goods in accordance with the requirements of the tariff act in the case of some future importation identical in character. We do not believe this interpretation is in accord with the legislative intention, which has in view not only the correct classification of imported articles, but also uniformity of classification at every port of the country.

Assuming that the board has jurisdiction to classify the goods in accordance with the claim made in the protest, if found to be correct, we find that while the bagging in question is suitable for covering cotton, it does not fall within the description of said paragraph 355 for the following reasons, which are clearly established by the evidence: It is not composed of jute, jute butts, or hemp, within the meaning of said paragraph, but is composed in chief value of aloe and other vegetable fibers other than jute, jute butts, or hemp.

An analysis was made of the merchandise with a correct valuation of the various component fibers contained in the fabric. The following result was reached, which was in no manner challenged by any evidence introduced at the hearing. It shows the value of the fibers of nonjute origin to be 52.85 per cent of the total value and that of all fibers of jute origin to be 47.15 per cent.

	Per cent.
Jute	None.
Jute butts	5.94
Mill waste (weft)	13.93
Mill waste (warp)	6.96
Cotton tares	20.21
Sea	2.64
New Zealand tow	10.05
Aloe	40.17
Total	100.00

The facts of the case, as found, place the goods for classification in said paragraph 358, as claimed in the protest. It is a woven fabric made of "other vegetable fibers" than there specially named, and is properly dutiable at 45 per cent ad valorem.

The protest is sustained and the collector's decision reversed, with instruction to reliquidate the entry accordingly.

(T. D. 31403—G. A. 7189).

BAGGING FOR COVERING COTTON—COMPRESS LABELS.

1. Patches for covering cotton: While certain pieces of bagging, similar in size, texture, and use to the merchandise passed on by the board in Wolff's case, G. A. 7098 (T. D. 30930), may be considered as bagging suitable for covering cotton, if, however, they are made in chief value of other vegetable fibers than jute, jute butts, or hemp, such articles are subject to classification for duty under paragraph 358 of the tariff act of 1909, as woven articles of the kind there described, at 45 per cent ad valorem, and not under paragraph 355, as bagging for covering cotton, made of jute, jute butts, or hemp.

2. Jurisdiction of the board: The board, under the powers conferred by law, will proceed to classify imported merchandise in accordance with the claim made in the protest, if sustained by satisfactory evidence, and will deny a motion to dismiss such protest on the ground that the rate of duty alleged to be applicable is greater than that assessed by the collector.—Following Schwartz's case, G. A. 7187 (T. D. 31401).

United States General Appraisers, New York, March 20, 1911.

In the matter of protest 478556 of T. Aubrey Byrne against the assessment of duty by the collector of customs at the port of New York.

Before Board 3 (Waite, Somerville, and Hay, General appraisers).

Somerville, General Appraiser: The collector in this case reports that the merchandise consists of 198 pieces of jute bagging, each piece measuring 32 by 42 inches, and commercially known as cotton patches, and that it is composed of single yarns, weighs over 15 ounces per square yard, and contains under 16 threads per square inch. He further reports that the material from which the pieces are cut are commercially known as bagging for cotton, and that the goods are of the same character as those passed on by the board in Wolff's case, G. A. 7098 (T. D. 30930).

The articles in question were accordingly assessed for duty at sixtenths of 1 cent per square yard, as bagging for cotton made of jute, under paragraph 355 of the tariff act of August 5, 1909. The importer claims the articles are not made of jute, but of other vegetable fibers, and are properly dutiable under paragraph 358 of said act at 45 per cent ad valorem. The rate claimed by the importer, it will be observed, is greater than the rate at which the goods were assessed by the collector. Counsel for the Government made a motion before the board to dismiss the case for want of jurisdiction on this ground.

A similar contention arose recently in the case of protest 444624 of Schwartz & Co., G. A. 7187 (T. D. 31401). For the reasons there stated the motion to dismiss for want of jurisdiction is overruled.

The testimony clearly establishes the fact that the collector was mistaken in reporting that the merchandise was made of jute. On the contrary, an analysis was made of the merchandise both by the importer and by Dr. Lyster H. Dewey, botanist in charge of fiber plants, of the United States Department of Agriculture. There is a remarkable coincidence between the results reached by each of these analyses, both as to the percentage of the different fibers that enter into the composition of the goods and of the value and character of these fibers. We append the following results as reached in each of said analyses:

	Dr. Dewey's percentage of value.	Importer's percentage of value.
Butts and rejections (jute origin)	0.077 to 0.133	0.106
Cotton tares and mill and factory wastes (various origin)	.298 to .293	.228
Russian seg	.081 to .093	.065
New Zealand tow and aloe	.542 to .480	.599
Total	.998 to .999	.998

We accordingly find that while the articles in question, represented by Exhibit 1, which are sometimes known as bootle bagging or bootle compress labels, may be considered as coverings for cotton, they are not composed of jute or of jute butts or of hemp, but that the fibers that enter into their composition consist in chief value of aloe, New Zealand tow, and Russian seg, and therefore fall within the description of "other vegetable fiber" and within the meaning of said paragraph 358. We find that the importation is more accurately described by the provisions of said paragraph 358 than by paragraph 355. The protest is accordingly sustained and the collector's decision reversed with instructions to classify the goods in accordance with the claim made in the protest.

This action on the part of an alleged importer of cotton bagging presents a remarkable instance of the importer insisting that the Government shall place a greater rate of duty upon his importations than the Government officials at the ports had placed upon them. And I am justified in saying that this was the result of a united effort or conspiracy on the part of those engaged in selling cotton bagging to increase the price of cotton bagging to the farmer. As illustrative of this I read the following from a letter of Mr. C. Lee McMillan, of New Orleans, a most reputable and worthy gentleman:

C. LEE MCMILLAN & CO. (LTD.),
New Orleans, April 8, 1911.

Hon. CHARLES LAFAYETTE BARTLETT,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: May I ask you to kindly have sent me a copy of your bills placing both bagging and ties upon the free list?

The Bagging Trust has grown very bold, as the following will show:

The Bagging Trust, while it uses any fiber, new or secondhand, it can work, even including what is called "bear grass," not to mention the salt it puts in its cloth to make weight, insists that all importations be passed upon by chemist, and where any fiber other than "jute, jute butts, or hemp" is found said importations must pay 45 per cent ad valorem, or say about 0.03 cent per yard.

The Bagging Trust, in order to better control the market, often buys up more than half the foreign mills can make each season.

Last year the trust owned in warehouse here some half million yards it had imported of as good Calcutta bagging as ever went on a bale of cotton. The duty of six-tenths of a cent, as covered by paragraph 355, had been paid by said trust upon same, and the entry liquidated by the New Orleans customhouse. Some months later the trust addressed a letter to the Secretary of Treasury informing him that said trust was satisfied an error had been made in classification by collector here, as it found said bagging contained some "jute mill waste," and on that account said trust suggested that the entry in question be reliquidated and it, the trust, would be glad to pay to the Government 45 per cent ad valorem duty. The Treasury Department saw the "cloven foot" and properly declined.

Next the trust protested certain entries here of bagging, imported for the express purpose of patching the sample holes in cotton bales, the trust claiming that said bagging, because it was 32 by 42 inches and was not used at the country gin but was put on at compress, was not entitled to entry at six-tenths of a cent, but should pay 45 per cent ad valorem.

In the above cases the trust has so far lost, but in its greed for gain it got a bale of bagging, which we understand was marked "C. L. M." (one of our marks), shipped same to Canada, and had it brought in at the Port of Boston. There the collector of port assessed same at six-tenths of a cent, same as here, but the trust protested that 45 per cent ad valorem should be the rate and carried the case before the Board of General Appraisers in New York.

Read, if you will, "Treasury Decisions," of March 23, 1911 (T. D. 31403; G. A. 7189), subject, "Bagging for Covering Cotton-Compress Labels," and you will see that the board sustained the trust. And, pending an appeal, which we learn the Government has made, we have been informed here that 45 per cent ad valorem duty will be charged us.

The term "compress labels" is one coined by the trust, and we suppose you can see their motive.

For many years past bagging patches to protect cotton by covering sample holes have been imported through this port and also at Galveston, but only recently has the trust undertaken their manufacture, and no sooner than it started to make same the trust cry went up that such bagging should not be admitted under paragraph 355, as same were "compress labels" and not a covering for cotton.

Out of 80,000,000 yards or more of bagging used each year only some 15,000,000 yards, including patches, are imported.

The duty on cotton ties, although reduced from five-tenths, "Dingley bill," to three-tenths of a cent per pound by the Payne-Aldrich bill, still prohibits any importations, as we can't pay 13½ cents per bundle duty, and I so informed the Ways and Means Committee when I went before it during the autumn of 1908.

Yours, respectfully, C. LEE MCMILLAN.

Surely those engaged in the manufacture and sale of this article of commerce are not entitled to any great consideration at the hands of Congress when they ask that this prohibitive and exorbitant rate of duty shall be maintained by the Government in order that they may continue to extort from the farmers of the South enormous sums of money from year to year as a tribute to them and to their rapacity and greed.

THE COTTON RAISER NOT PAID FOR HIS BAGGING AND TIES WHEN HE SELLS HIS COTTON.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] the other day, in discussing this provision of the bill, made a statement that the cotton farmer when he sold his cotton received payment for the cotton bagging and ties used in baling his cotton at the same rate at which the ties were sold. I protested against that statement at the time, but I find that he has placed in the RECORD as sustaining the assertion made by him a letter from Mr. Gary, chairman of the board of directors of the Steel Trust. This is the same statement that has been made on every occasion when an effort has been made to remove the duty on cotton bagging and ties. I will show the inaccuracy of the statement. I received from a reliable gentleman, who is fully informed on the subject and who for years has been familiar with the cotton trade, both foreign and domestic, a letter of date May 2, 1911, which states:

To those who are upholding the claim of the United States Steel Co. that the cotton planter reaps a large profit upon the ties he uses, you may say that all European or foreign cotton buyers figure the tare for bagging and ties as being 6 per cent. The majority of the American spinners figure this tare at 5 per cent, while none of them calculate tare at less than 4 per cent.

The average bale of cotton has on it—

	Pounds.
7 yards 2-pound bagging, say	14
6 steel bands, weighing 1½ pounds each	9
Making a total of	23

So you will see that the planter gets back nothing whatever for his bagging and ties.

When it is recalled that the rate of duty upon cotton ties has been so high and exorbitant that very few have been imported into the country; that the Steel Trust, which Mr. Gary represents and of which he is the head and chief, derives the benefit from the imposition of the duty, it will be seen at once the motives that inspire the suggestion made by him.

During the debate on the Payne-Aldrich bill in the Senate, June 28, 1909, the statement was made in the Senate by a Massachusetts Senator that the farmer was paid for his bagging and ties when he sold his cotton. To refute that statement the Senator from Texas presented and placed in the RECORD the following, which I think is a complete refutation of this statement, then made and now reiterated:

Senator CHARLES A. CULBERSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Yesterday Representative BURLESON telegraphed me as follows:

Antagonists of free bagging and ties contend that the spinner pays for bagging and ties when he buys cotton, and that in the end it proves a profit rather than a loss to cotton producers. I contend that 26 pounds tare is considered when market price of cotton is fixed, and want telegrams from cotton buyers and exchange officials to support my contention: Are deductions made for tare by foreign as well as domestic purchasers, and what effect does it have on price?"

And the following messages were sent in reply:

Your contention in dispatch concerning tare on cotton is true. When the farmer buys bagging and ties, he pays therefor some 9 cents per bale more than he would pay if free. When a spinner buys from his farmer he deducts from the worth of the cotton the amount of his loss by bagging and ties. Therefore the spinner does not pay the tariff profit that goes to the manufacturers of bagging and ties, and the farmer does. But even if the spinner did pay, antagonists' argument is not strengthened, because spinner would add excess to manufactured product and thus increase the cost to consumer. In either case, the trusts collect the profit and the people pay.

W. B. THOMPSON,
President New Orleans Cotton Exchange.

It is a well-known fact that all buyers on both sides of the Atlantic allow in the prices they pay fully enough, if not more than enough, to offset the weight of bagging and ties on a bale. As a general thing, 6 per cent is allowed for tare by foreign spinners. While all spinners practically buy on the basis of tare, care is generally taken that allowances always equal and frequently exceed actual tare.

HENRY G. HESTER.

All cotton sold for export deducts 6 per cent tare for bagging and ties. Domestic mills claim 4 to 5 per cent tare.

NORMAN EUSTIS,
Acting Chairman Cotton Factors' Association.

Cotton sold for export carries 6 per cent deduction for tare. Domestic mills calculate about 5 per cent.

NEW ORLEANS COTTON BUYERS & EXPORTERS' ASSOCIATION, A. M. WEST, President.

Cotton exporters calculate 6 per cent tare for bagging and ties; eastern spinners 23 to 25 pounds per bale. Carolina Mills Association rule 4 reads: "On compressed cotton the tare should not exceed 24 pounds and on uncompressed cotton 20 pounds per bale." Cotton producers pay for their bagging and ties. Any spinner will give more for 500 pounds net cotton than for a bale weighing 500 pounds gross, including bagging and ties.

C. LEE MCMILLAN.

You doubtless know as well as I do that every spinner calculates in buying cotton what allowance to make for tare on bagging and ties, and, as the same amounts to between 5 and 6 per cent, no one ever overlooks it.

C. LEE MCMILLAN.

In the testimony given before the Ways and Means Committee of the House in 1908 I find the following:

Mr. GRIGGS. I want to settle one matter that I think you understand very thoroughly. An intimation was made here this morning that the farmer resells his bagging. What tare is taken off for bagging and ties at the factory?

Mr. MCMILLAN. Six per cent is the allowance calculated upon; 30 pounds for each 500-pound bale of cotton.

Mr. GRIGGS. At 9 cents a pound, that would be how much?

Mr. MCMILLAN. That would be $2.70.

Mr. GRIGGS. That the farmer loses in the price of cotton, because it is taken off the price of cotton. I do not believe it is deducted absolutely, but that is taken into consideration in fixing the price of cotton.

Mr. MCMILLAN. In other words, he does not sell bagging and ties at the price of cotton, but their weight is deducted in the final account.

Mr. GRIGGS. And it amounts to $2.70 per bale?

Mr. MCMILLAN. Yes, sir.

I now read the following from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 27, 1909, showing that I then furnished evidence which was, and now is, a complete refutation of the statement made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and the letter he had printed in the RECORD from the representative of the Steel Trust, Mr. Gary.

This contention, I knew, was not capable of being sustained by proof. To show what the truth is, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] and myself sought and obtained the information contained in the telegrams we received, and which are as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 25, 1909.

Hon. W. W. GORDON,
Savannah, Ga.:

Opponents free bagging and ties claim producer is paid for same at price of cotton by spinner without deduction for tare. Please wire what deduction is made for bagging and ties, and in what way and how considered in fixing price. Does rule apply to both foreign and domestic spinners?

C. L. BARTLETT.

SAVANNAH, GA., May 26, 1909.

Hon. C. L. BARTLETT,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Offers from Europe name a price which includes cost of freight, marine insurance, and 6 per cent tare on a 500-pound bale. Six per cent would be 40 pounds, which covers 16 pounds for 8 yards of bagging, 8 pounds for 8 ties, and 6 pounds for natural drying of cotton and consequent shrinkage in weight; nominally, the farmer is paid for bagging and ties, but the spinner can't spin them. He sells them for junk; consequently the price he offers is a figure arrived at after deducting what his loss will be on the bagging and ties; also is true that farmer in reality is not paid for bagging and ties. American spinners usually get 28 pounds tare, and also deduct from price they pay for cotton the loss they will sustain on the bagging and ties.

NEW ORLEANS COTTON BUYERS' AND EXPORTERS' ASSN.,
A. J. WEST, President.

These telegrams are from gentlemen of the highest character and standing in the business world, whose word will be accepted by all who know them as absolutely the truth.

Gen. W. W. Gordon, of Savannah, Ga., is a prominent cotton merchant, a buyer and exporter of cotton for many years, and who is in every way qualified by information, knowledge, and experience to give testimony on this subject; and there can be no question that his statements contain the absolute truth.

Mr. Chairman, I have done what I could to aid in lessening the burdens of those who are engaged in the production of the world's greatest staple; I have introduced these bills to take away from them the burdens of taxation. I have sought in every Congress to have it done, and now the hope seems about to be realized. God grant that it may, and that the just and thoughtful men of both parties and from every section in this Congress will give to the people who are so much entitled to receive it the same freedom from unjust taxation that the farmers of the North and West have so long enjoyed. Justice demands that it be done. None but a few favored trusts—combined corporations—have been heard to oppose.

THE YEOMANRY OF THE UNITED STATES.

I have investigated somewhat and compared the various conditions of our fellow men in the principal countries of Europe and the United States, and especially in the South, and I have come to the conclusion that there is not a people on earth, taken as a whole, so highly favored in the substantial blessings of life as the yeomanry of the United States, and especially of the South. True, there are other countries and States that surpass us in wealth and power, in military strength, in magnificence and display of expensive arts, but there is none which can so justly lay claim to the character of a free and happy people as those I have the honor in part to represent.

The future of this country is full of exciting hope. But it depends in the largest measure on the tillers of the soil whether that hope shall be realized or not. The neglect to improve our agriculture will be followed by the decay of all else we ought to cherish in morals and government as well as in arts, for a well-cultivated soil produces not grains, grasses, cotton, corn, fruits, but another and far more precious crop—men—men who know their rights and dare maintain them; a bold, honest and intelligent people, the just pride and the sure defense of every nation. [Applause.]

The child may now be born whose old age will look upon the American people and see them 300,000,000 strong—the southern cotton-raising States, now with 20,000,000 inhabitants, doubling every 22½ years, 60,000,000 strong. With such a population, living under a government of equal laws, with no special privileges to the favored few or sections, moving onward and upward with the energies which freedom alone can inspire, and aided by the highest science in making the most of their natural advantages, what shall prevent their success? Who shall curb the career of such a people or set a limit to its deep-founded strength? [Applause.] The great poet, Milton, himself never dreamed of a power so boundless or a people so blessed, not even in that enraptured vision when he saw "a mighty and puissant nation, rousing herself like a strong man after sleep, and shaking her invincible locks," or like "an eagle renewing her mighty youth and kindling her undazzled eye at the full blaze of the midday beam, purging and unscaling her sight at the fountain itself of heavenly radiance." The man who, with his senses open to the truth, would thwart such a destiny or refuse to aid to accomplish it is either careless or untrue, not only to his country, but to the best interest and highest hopes of the human race. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK]. [Applause.]

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I shall neither afflict the country nor the committee with a speech on the tariff. I will say, however, that I shall record my vote for the pending bill with a great deal of pleasure, because it is the first measure for the real benefit of the American farmer which has been seriously proposed in this House since I have been a Member of it. While, as I have said, I shall not discuss the tariff, I do want to say in passing that my distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN], the leader of the minority, reminded me very much a few days ago—I will not say when displaying his ignorance on the subject, but when he made certain interrogations as to farming implements—of a young man in the city whose father decided it would be better for him to spend a year or two on the farm and get some practical information. He had never been in the country in his life. He knew nothing about chickens and pigs and ducks and things of that kind. Shortly after he reached the farm he was sent out one morning to feed the fowls. He scattered the corn. This farmer had a quantity of chickens and a large number of ducks—these broad-billed muscovies.

These ducks got in amongst the chickens, and those of us who have lived upon the farms and know something of that life, know how when you feed a lot of chickens and ducks together the ducks, instead of picking up the corn a grain at a time, come along with their immense bills and just shovel it in. This boy saw that, and he had, what I fear sometimes our friends on the other side do not have, a sense of justice and fair play. So, acting upon that notion, he took out a pocket-knife and began to catch those ducks and trim their bills down to a point like the chickens. The farmer came along in the meantime and said, "What do you mean; what are you doing this for?" The young man replied, "These ducks are simply shoveling it all up and depriving the chickens of their fair share, and I thought it was nothing but right to trim their bills and make them get down and pick fair with the rest of them." [Laughter and applause.]

The object of this bill, as I understand it, is to make the protected interests of the country get down on a dead level with the farmer and pick their living with the rest of us.

Mr. Chairman, as I said, without going into the tariff proposition, I want to call the attention of the House and the country to another question which, it seems to me, involves the integrity of the proceedings of this House. During the six years that I have been here I have heard gentlemen complain, not only in private conversation, but on the floor of the House, of the fact that the House had lost the respect of the American people, that the House had given up prerogative after prerogative until it had become a sort of byword with the people of the country, and that they, the people, no longer held that respect for it which they had in the olden days. Having this condition of affairs in mind, I introduced recently a resolution, which I desire to ask that the Clerk will read in my time, for I want to get it into the RECORD, and I believe that when gentlemen consider it carefully they will see that it will, if adopted, work a reform much needed in the management of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the rules of the House of Representatives be, and the same are hereby, amended by adding thereto an additional rule, to be known as Rule XLIV, and to read as follows:

"Rule XLIV. No Member shall be permitted to have printed in the RECORD any speech or portion of a speech not actually delivered by him upon the floor of the House, except upon condition that immediately preceding and connected with such speech or portion of speech there shall be printed in the RECORD in bold, black-faced type the words: 'The following remarks were not delivered in the House and are simply inserted here on request of Hon. ——— ———,' naming the Member whose remarks are to be so printed: Provided, That no Member shall under any condition be allowed to print in the RECORD any portion of any article, writing, speech, or document not of his own composition, other than statistical information, except he actually reads or quotes the same while on the floor and when he is actually addressing the House."

Mr. Chairman, upon investigation of this subject I find that it has at different times created discussion in both Houses of Congress. As far back as 1852, on May 20, Mr. Clingman, of North Carolina, I believe, in correcting the Globe, after stating that the report of the proceedings in the Globe for a certain day showed that while he held the floor he gave way to a certain Member who made a speech, occupying several columns, and that he then proceeded with his own speech, making no reference to the interjected speech, said:

Now, the fact is just this, that a gentleman from New York said he wished that I would give him the floor for a single moment, and that his object was to notify the House that he intended to publish a speech. I told him, of course, that I had no objection—it is a pure matter of taste. I then informed the House that I had given him the floor for that purpose. I made that statement, and he made the statement to the committee, that he intended to publish a speech. I took it for granted that all of that would go into the Globe. If that had been done, everybody would then have seen that the speech which followed had not actually been delivered in the House, and I and other gentlemen should have been relieved of all responsibility of answering it. Several gentlemen have come to me, and said they considered such a thing a fraud on the House. I will not use such a strong expression myself. I have no objection to the publication of speeches in the Congressional Globe that have not been delivered here; but the fact that they were not delivered ought to be known and understood.

On December 23, 1852, Mr. Stanley, of North Carolina, by unanimous consent, offered a resolution as follows:

Resolved, That the reporters of the House of Representatives be directed hereafter not to report in the Daily Globe, as part of the proceedings of the House, speeches not made in the House.

Amended by adding—

Provided, That nothing in this resolution shall prevent any Member from correcting or revising the reporters' notes.

This resolution as amended was passed by the House.

On May 23, 1860, the House was considering certain amendments to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. The fourth amendment was as follows:

Provided further, That the reporters of the House shall not report any remark made by any Member who is not first recognized by the Speaker or Chairman who may be presiding at the time; and that nothing said in the House, declared to be out of order, or that is said by one Member without leave when another is upon the floor, nor anything not actually said in debate, shall be reported. (Rejected by a vote of 75 yeas to 82 nays. Cong. Globe, 36th Cong., 1st sess., pp. 2284–2285.)

On July 20, 1867, Mr. Ashley, of Ohio, asked unanimous consent that certain gentlemen who had prepared speeches on a veto message of the President and who had no opportunity to deliver them should be allowed to print them in the Globe. Mr. Ross, of Illinois, said that he would not object to the printing of those already prepared, but if the request were broad enough to permit Members to go home and prepare speeches to be thus printed he would object. Consent was limited to those already prepared. (Cong. Globe, 40th Cong., 1st sess., p. 757.)

On February 21, 1870, the Senate passed a concurrent resolution, as follows:

No speech not actually delivered in Congress shall be printed in the Globe. (Cong. Globe, pt. 2, 41st Cong., 2d sess., p. 1457.)

And I may say here that that is a substitute offered by Senator Conkling, of New York, to the original resolution offered by another Senator. I am quoting some of these authorities to show the committee and the country that abler and wiser men than some of us who are now studying this question have seen the evils of it and have undertaken to correct this proceeding, which is, in effect, without any notice, a fraud upon the country.

On December 23, 1884, Senator Vest, of Missouri, submitted to the Senate a concurrent resolution, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the reports in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD shall be an accurate transcript of the proceedings and the debates of the two Houses of Congress, and that no speech shall be published therein which was not spoken in the Senate or in the House of Representatives; and such speeches shall be printed as they were actually delivered, except verbal corrections made by the author of the speech, and by no other person; and that when speeches are reserved by their authors for correction they shall be returned to the reporter of the House in which they were delivered within one week, and if not so returned they shall then be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD from the original notes of the reporter. (Cong. Rec., vol. 16, pt. 1, 48th Cong., 2d sess., p. 423.)

Now, Senator Vest made a speech on that subject at that time, and I have copied an extract from it, which I wish to call to the attention of the committee. He said:

Good faith between the people and their servants, public morality, and decency demand that the abuses now existing should be remedied. What could be more ruinous to the cause of truth than the daily printing of debates which have no existence? What can be more demoralizing and disheartening to the young and honest reader of the RECORD than the discovery that the Representative whom he has been taught to admire as an exemplar of all public virtues is a public cheat and fraud? (Cong. Rec., vol. 16, pt. 1, 48th Cong., 2d sess., p. 423.)

Senator FRYE, in discussing that resolution, said this:

I remember very distinctly reading in the RECORD a speech which was made about the manufacturers of New England, and charges were made that the operatives in those mills were slaves, that they were almost starved to death, that they were treated more inhumanly than the slaves of the South ever were treated. A constituent of mine called my attention for the first time to it and wanted to know if I was not present attending to my duty and why I had permitted a thing of that kind to go unchallenged.

That was when Senator FRYE was a Member of the House.

Well, it was one Saturday when nobody was there except the Speaker of the House of Representatives and six other Members, each one of whom had a long speech to deliver and each one of whom perhaps read 5 or 10 minutes and then printed about a 2-hour speech. That seems to me the most serious difficulty about the matter. (Cong. Record, vol. 16, pt. 1, 48th Cong., 2d sess., p. 424.)

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have read those extracts because I wanted them to go into the RECORD. I want to say now that on two occasions I have availed myself of this rule—I am not pretending that I have not done that. One was a speech which I delivered to the legislature of my State, which I did not care to repeat here, and one was a speech recently, before the last adjournment, on the shipping bill, and I did not get time to deliver it.

But, look at it as we may, it is in effect a deceit, it is a fraud, it is wrong, and the RECORD as published to-day does not speak the truth.

Now, if a gentleman writes an essay and he thinks there is such merit in his composition that the great American public ought to read it, he ought not to be averse to printing it as an essay; he ought not to be averse to putting the public upon notice that the speech was not delivered, but only prepared, by him; and that he thought there was such merit in its composition that the people of the country ought to have the benefit of the product of his brain.

As I say, Mr. Chairman, we are perpetrating a fraud upon the people when we do it. I have heard some intimations about the preparation of speeches that I am not going to mention here. I want to say this: I have not, although I have invoked the rule twice and printed speeches that I did not deliver, denied that they were mine. The bad grammar, the bad spelling, and everything else, were mine. Nobody else was responsible for them, and I do not intend to go far enough to ask anybody to correct either my spelling or my grammar.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman's spelling would be corrected by the Government Printing Office, regardless of his motion.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman speaks of a rule. Really, there is no rule permitting the thing to be done which the gentleman is now opposing, is there?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. There is a custom, and there is a rule; yes. Because when a Member gets upon this floor and asks unanimous consent, such consent is always given, and this custom has become as inexorable and as unchangeable as the laws of the Medes and Persians. And no man can stay on this floor all the time—I have tried that—to watch the RECORD. The moment the objector goes out, somebody repeats his request and it is granted and the speech goes in anyhow.

Mr. SIMS. I would like to ask further this question. I do not mean to be in opposition to what the gentleman is saying. He is discussing the matter very clearly. Suppose we do adopt the resolution and it becomes the rule of the House. Can it not be suspended by unanimous consent at any time, and will not objection still have to be made? That is what I want to ask.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Possibly so; but I want to say this to the gentleman: I am going to introduce—as was introduced by Senator Vest and these other gentlemen—a joint resolution, requiring the concurrence of both Houses and the signature of the President. That has the force and effect of law, and I do not understand that this House, by unanimous consent, can waive it.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, we can practically reach the matter in another way. There is now a rule of the House that prohibits the entertaining of a motion to draw seats during the life of a Congress, after they are once drawn. That rule has always been observed, and it would not be in order for the Chair to put an unanimous request for the redrawing of seats after they are once drawn. Now, it would be very easy to make it out of order to present a request for unanimous consent to print in the RECORD. If the gentleman will permit me a moment further, I will say that for several years past I have at various times taken occasion to comment on this same abuse, and I thoroughly agree with the gentleman that it is a constant reflection upon the membership of this House that we should tolerate a method of misrepresentation to the country of our activities here.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Kentucky is an expert parliamentarian, and I take it that his statement of the effect of a rule of that kind would be absolutely correct.

Now, I want to say this——

Mr. SIMS. Let me make a suggestion in that connection, that we now have a rule, as I remember, that it shall not be in order for the Speaker to entertain any motion or request to use this Hall for any purpose other than that designated by the law and the rules. And yet I have seen a request of that kind made and submitted, and not being objected to it was declared as ordered. It was done in the case of Col. Goethals, you know, when he gave his lecture on the Panama Canal in this Hall.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] one minute more.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I just want to say this, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion: This would not only, if adopted, make the RECORD speak the truth and put us right before the country, but it would be a measure of economy. We would save in the composition, we would save in the amount paid to the railroads for hauling these immense volumes of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD all over this country. Senator FRYE stated, I think—one of those experienced gentlemen did—that when he first became a Member of Congress one volume of the Congressional Globe sufficed for the record of a short session of Congress and two volumes for the record of a long session. To-day when you get a copy of the RECORD of a session of Congress delivered at your town you have got to get a dray to have it hauled to your house.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say that I desire to present these few remarks and put the data in the RECORD in order that gentlemen may look into this matter and think it over and see if we can not get some rule here that will preserve the integrity of this House and challenge the respect of the American people which this House once enjoyed. [Applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I now yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. LITTLEPAGE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. LITTLEPAGE] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. LITTLEPAGE. Mr. Chairman, I have been listening for more than two weeks now to the great speeches delivered before this the greatest body of men upon the globe, and although I am a new Member I can not longer refrain from presenting my views in this presence and to the country in reference to the two twin bills, the reciprocity bill, just passed, and the free-list bill now under consideration.

Adhering to the resolution adopted by the West Virginia Legislature instructing her Senators and requesting her Congressmen to vote for the reciprocity bill, I cast my vote for that measure, believing, too, at the same time, that it was right. Some remarkable speeches were made against that bill. How some of these stand-pat Republicans could speak against the bill and then vote for its passage I am at a loss to comprehend, unless they wanted to be recorded for and against the bill, so that whichever way the die is cast they would be at least halfway on the winning side. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

You stand-pat Republicans have sinned away your day of grace. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The men of your party—I mean the patriotic Republicans who love their country and to whom their country's good is higher than party perfidy are the insurgents or independent Republicans of this country—you meet them everywhere, both here in Congress and in the country, and as a rule wherever you find one you find in him a patriotic and honest man, the noblest work of God. The Republican Party has been a great party, but the party of Lincoln, of Grant, Blaine, Conkling, and McKinley is not the Republican Party of to-day. Your leaders—not all of them, but nearly all—have descended into a commercial party, and in order to secure campaign contributions so that elections could be carried with money have formed a joint stock company with the trusts and special interests of the country, until to-day the trusts and special interests are more powerful than even the Government itself in your stand-pat policies. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Your great party is divided both here and at home. Even the old Union soldiers are losing heart and faith and are voting the Democratic ticket. They fought for, and still want, a fair deal. They are opposed to ring rule. They are opposed, and so are their children, to graft and corruption in any form. They still love this country, and they have taught their children to love Old Glory and the sentiment that that flag represents. They do not want to see it trailed in the mire, either at home or abroad. They feel neglected here at Washington, are hurt and feel resentful, and you can not blame them. Their boys, long since grown to manhood, are, in thousands of instances, all over the land, proclaiming their political independence, and are resenting the neglect shown their fathers, and are turning their backs upon the party of trusts and special interests on that account, as well as in order to save this great Republic from its impending doom; yes, they are studying, thinking of the past and future, turning and voting for those old-time Jeffersonian cardinal principles of "equal rights for all and special privileges for none." [Loud applause on the Democratic side and among the insurgents.]

In the name of justice, where are we drifting? How soon shall we reach the end of our present course? There exists a seething caldron of oppressed, dissatisfied, and poverty-stricken humanity throughout our common country. Some say it is because of foreign immigration, and I think this is a great source of our internal troubles in certain directions. Others say it is because of discrimination. Others say it is because of special privileges being granted by the Government to those who have no love for their fellow man, except to use him and impoverish him. God help us to save this Republic. [Loud applause.]

I was amazed the other day at the apprehensions expressed about annexation of Canada by Mr. PRINCE, of Illinois, but this was so in the case of the Louisiana purchase act, as you will remember. That act had its bitter enemies on the floor of Congress; yet the bill went through, and the future generations have revered the name of the President, the Senators, and Congressmen who stood out against magnified public sentiment at that time, as now, and made it possible to annex that beautiful, fertile, rich, and great country to this Republic. But my friend, the distinguished Congressman from Illinois, found fault with the President—the President of my country and his—and he went so far as to insinuate that the President of this country was playing into the hands of the Democratic Party. He did not say it in so many words, but away down in his heart it seems to me that he felt it.

Why has it become necessary for the President of the United States to convene Congress in extraordinary session twice in two years, the second time in history? In my judgment, Mr. Chairman, it is because the President sees the tendency of the times. I disagree with many of the stand-pat Republicans. I think the President is an honest man, and you shall not abuse him except over our protest. I think the President sees the process of disintegration which has set in within the Republican ranks, and in order to save, if he can, the remnants of the old guard of his party, he has convened us here, hoping that the Democrats will help him save the Republic and the people from the ravages of trusts and unholy greed. While he knows we are patriotic and want to upbuild this Nation and help the humble people of this country, you stand-pat Republicans are in hopes we will fall out among ourselves, and, as some of our opponents say, will go to pieces. But mark you, the signs of the times in the rear and in front point to the fact—and I hope you will not think hard of me when I say it—that you Republican standpatters are now, if you never have been before, right up against the real proposition in this country. The people have warned you in 1910 by their votes. You have played so long, and have transacted business to such an extent with the special interests, and have given them so many special favors in order that they may give you money to carry your elections, that your people and my people have become not only skeptical and suspicious, but they are demanding an account of your stewardship. They fear that all is not well, and in justification of that fact you see before you now a young man, a straight Democrat, who comes from a district that heretofore has been nearly 6,000 Republican, and one of the most wealthy districts in this country, including the Great Kanawha and New River coal fields, succeeding a stand-pat Republican. Since I have been of age I have never seen the Republican Party so torn asunder and rent in pieces as it is in that great district to-day, and that is so because the rank and file of that party feel that they have been neglected here in Washington. They feel that there is more due them than they have received; and in that they are right. They feel that the principles for which Lincoln stood, for which Grant stood, and that McKinley advocated, are no longer the sentiments that actuate the Republican Party of this Nation. In order, as the boys say, to "hog the ring," you standpatters have gobbled up everything fore and aft, in and out of sight, or loose at both ends, and you have neglected the people at home until the time has come during your administration when poor men in the country can hardly afford to have meat on their tables three times a day. [Great applause on the Democratic side.]

It is a sad thing to think about. It is an awful thing to think of the poor people at home in all of our districts, morning, noon, and night, looking to Washington and hoping for relief from the tyrannical and heartless trusts, while here in the Halls of Congress there are men playing to the galleries and the country, endeavoring to make such a record as will enable them, two years from now, to steal again into the White House. In the meantime they are so neglecting the people at home that it is growing harder and harder for the poor people to live. I say again, where are we drifting? [Loud and spontaneous applause.]

The time has come in this country when the standpatters have said that Canadian reciprocity would act detrimentally to to the agricultural interests of the United States. By their speeches they have played upon the sentiment of the country and have tried, with the wonderful aid of the Paper and Steel Trusts, to work up the prejudice of the farmer. But they can not maintain that position, because of the fact that the opening of that new country will afford to the American farmer, when the tariff wall is torn down between the two countries, more extensive market for his product, thereby giving him better prices. When they are forced from the position that reciprocity will be detrimental to the American farmer then they go back and say to the country, "We must look after the laboring people." How well have you, Mr. Standpatter, looked after the laboring people? It has been said upon this floor by very distinguished men that the American workman is the best-paid workman in the civilized world, and you have repeatedly used that old, catchy, prejudicial, and crude Republican, now threadbare, argument, "We do not want to bring American labor in competition with foreign pauper labor." This is your last stand, and when this ground is cut from under your already divided house, your fall will be great. You will then fall upon your knees and you will pray long and loud, but if you remember, "The prayers of the wicked availeth nothing." Your time has come; you must go. Your books have been audited by the people, and the defalcation discovered, and the prison of public opinion is staring you in the face. Your countenances have fallen before the gaze of a long-suffering but triumphant, God-fearing, liberty loving, but outraged people. [Loud and prolonged applause.]

Listen while I tell you the truth, as it will do you good, and I do not mean to be hard on you, although you have treated my people and yours so badly, and practiced deception so long, I can hardly refrain from saying some bad words. [Applause.]

I want the record I make here to-day to speak for itself to my people at home. They have been good to me, and my heart swells with gratitude and affection for them. I want to speak the truth. I want the poor men who work in the mines and on the hilltops and in the valleys, in the factories, on the railroads, and who feel neglected and can hardly keep the grim and gray wolf from the door on account of high cost of living—and it is not only so in my district, but in the district of every Congressman within the sound of my voice—I want them to know the facts. Stated in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 44, of the Sixty-first Congress, page 3256, you will find the average product of the American laborer as well as the European laborer. Listen, oh listen, to the truth. It is there stated that the annual output of the American laborer is $2,450. The average annual output of the Canadian laborer is $1,455; Australia, average annual output, $900; French, average annual output, $650; England, average annual output, $556; Germany, average annual output, $460. I maintain that the man of average intellect can see from these statistics that the American wage earner earns nearly twice as much as the Canadian and does not receive twice as much pay. That the American laborer produces nearly three times as much as the Australian and hardly receives twice as much for his toil. That the American produces nearly four times as much as the Frenchman and does not receive twice as much pay. That the American laborer produces nearly five times as much as the English laborer and does not receive twice as much pay. That the American laborer produces nearly six times as much as the German laborer and receives but a little over twice as much pay. Now, where is your argument about "foreign pauper labor"? [Loud applause on the Democratic side.] These statistics were used by a Republican United States Senator, and I challenge a contradiction from any Congressman on this floor. This shows that according to the productiveness of the American toiler he is the poorest-paid workman in the world, except in China and a few other uncivilized countries, which we do not seriously consider in this country. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

And yet you charitably inclined, stand-pat Republicans, in the face of that Republican authority, undertake at this late day in your career, when you are passing away, to make the impression on the people that the American wage earner is the best-paid laborer in the world. I say again, according to his productive capacity, as shown by these statistics, he is the poorest-paid wage earner in the world. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

My district produces more coal and better coal and cheaper coal than any other one district, except the anthracite, in the United States. You stand-pat Republicans have made it hard on our coal operators. The men feel they are overcharged at the company stores, and yet it is a fact that the prices are fixed by the trusts you have created, until the coal operator in my district makes less profit in his store than ever before in the history of his business.

But I am proud to say that they are reliable men of pluck and determination, of purpose in life, who through sunshine and storm have stood by public enterprise and have made the community better for having lived in it. Their word, when once given, is as good as a Government bond, and because of their faithful devotion to their business I am proud to proclaim that West Virginia will soon become the greatest coal-producing State in this Union. May God bless her people and their destiny. Our farmers, merchants, railroads, and toilers are all hoping and praying that the Government at Washington may again be brought into closer relationship with the rank and file of a Christian people. They have read in the Good Book that Christ drove the money changers from the Temple, and are now consoled that the slimy hands of the wicked trusts are being broken loose from Washington by the advance guard of an unterrified but steady Democracy, aided by business men, toilers, old Union soldiers and their sons, all making up an irresistible band of patriarchs, who commenced in 1910, and will finish in 1912, the job of driving the "money changers" out of Washington, thereby repeating history, redeeming and restoring this Government to the people. [Loud and prolonged applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, they have told us, and incorporated in the RECORD up to date, in effect, that they are opposed to any free-list bill. They are the party of protection, and I do not mean to be unkind or ungenerous when I suggest that that old name of the "party of protection" ought to be changed to the "party of the trusts and special interests."

I want the record I make here to show that from the Payne-Aldrich-Cannon-Gaines tariff and free-list bill of 1909, beginning on page 68 and running over to page 79, the country will observe that in every line in these pages are listed commodities and things produced in this country and put on the free list—a Republican free list. But the country will also observe that the things incorporated on the free list in these pages are not the things produced by the trust manufacturers in this country.

I will read from that tariff and free-list bill: On page 69 they put on the free list "apatite." Men can not afford to have good appetites now; things are too eternally high. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] I notice on page 70 of the Republican free-list bill that they have "balm of Gilead." We are going to give the people by our free list the balm of new hope, of better life, by improvement of living conditions, better wages, and cheaper commodities. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I note on page 70, at the bottom, they put on the free list "blood, dried, not specially provided for in this section." We propose to give the people, and to place on the free list, the things required to rehabilitate and rejuvenate the ambition of men by taking the tariff off of the rich foods, that the toiling masses may have, free of tariff, meat, breadstuffs, vegetables, wearing apparel, and some of the good things of life that the Republican trusts have been living so long upon—the common people in the meantime almost starving for. You remember the story of Lazarus seeking the crumbs from the rich man's table. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We want none of your dried blood—we want new and honest blood turned into the heart of our body politic. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I see, on page 71 of that magnanimous free-list bill, that they have "catgut," "worm gut," "not manufactured," of course. We do not care anything about the "catgut," or "worm gut," either. The poor people do not want them—they never have eaten them yet. We are going to put on the free list, for the benefit of the people, beef, mutton, pork, hominy, and beans, and thereby go you standpatters one better. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] I notice, on page 72 of that magnanimous Republican free-list bill, the words "cotton," "cotton waste or flocks." We are going to go you one better and give the cotton farmers, and all other farmers, free of tariff, agricultural implements, and protect them from the ravages of the trusts by taking the tariff off the cotton bagging that the cotton farmers, and not the trusts, shall live thereby, be prosperous, and enabled to lay up a competency for the rainy days of life. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I notice, a little further down on the same page, that the Republicans put on the free list "cuttle-fish bone." It is a sight to look at these things. We propose to give them free, without the "cuttle," fish, take the tariff off of fish, that the people can have fresh fish to eat, and let the bones go toward fertilizing the soil. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] Let the trusts have the cuttle-fish bone awhile, so that the shoe may get on the other foot just one time in life. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] I see, a little farther down on the same page, free "dragon's blood dried"—no, "dragon's blood"; I do not want to misquote it, because it is bad enough. We give them, on our free list, a new life, full of hope and gratitude, by the fulfillment of Democratic campaign pledges, each one of which we have filled up to date, and are going clear down the line, in a conservative, sane, and business-like manner in the interest of the people. [Applause on the Democratic side.] You standpatters had just as well get ready and take your medicine like good, game men. I notice, on page 73 of this charitably inclined free-list bill, they have "ergot" on the free list. We are opposed to abortion and in favor of "multiplying and replenishing the earth." No Roosevelt Republican could have voted to put "ergot" on the free list. [Loud laughter and applause on all sides.] I notice, a little farther down on the same page, that they give to the people free "fence posts of wood." We go them one better and give them free wire to complete the fences, as farms could not be protected without fence wires nailed onto the posts. And the reason the Republicans did not give them free wire was because they did not want to offend the Wire Trust. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Nor is that all. On page 73 you find the Republicans have given the people free of tariff "fossils." The Lord knows they have plenty of them to spare. They do not know what to do with them except to give them to the "dear people." Their very souls are on fire with love (?) for the "people," but it is too late—"almost persuaded now to believe." They can not longer cover or hide from the searchlight of truth. Since November last they have pricked their ears up like a fox in the woods which was only snapped at. The gun will go off in 1912, and the foxy standpatters will be swept off the Hill. The people will come into their own. It was once said "when ——— (certain people) fall out, honest men get their dues." Take your old "fossils," go home and crawl under the bed, and play with the cats. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Again, sir, on page 74, they take the tariff off of "hones and whetstones." They are not trust products yet. How about the razors? They are trust products and are protected by a tremendous tariff (see page 18, paragraph 152), so that the poor man who has to shave at least once a month or his wife will drive him to the woods, has to contribute to the trust money every time he shaves himself. [Applause.]

On the same page, 74, they graciously put on the free list free of tariff "leeches." God knows the trusts and special interests (leeches) have long since sapped the financial life blood out of the common people by way of tariffs on the necessaries of life until they can well afford to put "leeches" on the free list, and look at them around this Capitol, drawing salaries, on the pay rolls and doing so little, if any, service. They look like wood ticks that disturb my hounds in summer time until they get full of blood and drop by the wayside. Away with your free "leeches," the people have no use for them. [Loud applause.]

On the same page, 74, they have given the "dear people" free "loadstone;" neither is that a trust product. I am not surprised at this generosity; they have given the people the gold-brick racket so long they must devise another scheme or they are lost. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, the standpatters must have the miners' vote or they can not stem or navigate the stream, the current of which is becoming dangerously swift, and on page 75 they put on the free list "Miners' rescue appliances, designed for artificial breathing, necessary in presence of poisonous gases," used always successfully after the explosion when hundreds of poor women are made widows and children made orphans—all cast upon a cold and uncharitable world, homes broken up, loved ones gone forever, treachery to take the place of kindness, devotion, and love. Great God, have mercy upon us all! Guide us aright, that public servants may draw nearer and closer to those bereaved, deserving but neglected, useful toilers. [Loud and long applause.]

When a sane and reasonable fellow-servant bill or a proper employers' liability act is proposed to protect the employer and the employee alike, you standpatters have either killed it or made it possible for the courts to declare it unconstitutional. [Applause.] You deserve that which you will surely receive. Honest employers want their employees protected by a sane and reasonable law. Coal operators are often broken up financially and always rendered miserable by explosions. The phantom of funeral processions of their faithful men lingers with them day and night. The dead bodies of trust magnates lie in state at some public place for days and are viewed by thousands. The bodies of poor miners, often not recognizable as the result of terrific and deadly explosions, are laid away to rest forever in an unmarked tomb. No man would desire to cripple or impede the progress of coal operators or developers of the country, because he would be an enemy to public development and progress, and while protecting them, men of purpose and official integrity should lose no opportunity to protect, encourage, and render hope of a better life and better conditions to the men who delve beneath the hills and valleys of our country. [Long and loud applause.]

I see on page 77 of that bill they have put "sheep dip" on the free list. Neither is this a product of the trusts. The people will not longer take chances on getting either the measles or the mumps by a continuation of present conditions, high cost of living, misery, want, and woe. They have proposed and are going to have a change. They want, instead of the "dip," fat mutton to put on their tables at a cost within reach of toiling men. [Great applause on the Democratic side.]

On the same page we find on their free list "shrimps, shellfish and silkworm eggs." They are not products of the trusts—not cornered yet. What on earth can we do with them? How can the laboring man live upon them? [Applause.] The Democrats will pass the free-list bill, under discussion, and give men and their families, free of tariff, wholesome meats, breadstuffs, flour, corn meal, bacon, beans, and some dessert. They have to come. They are to be had, and we are pledged. We will make good and let a Republican Senate, as the standpatters are in charge there, take the responsibility of defeating the will of a long-suffering and now indignant people, and you will find that body losing prestige in the country and its membership in the stand-pat column. [Applause.]

We have passed the bill to elect Senators by direct vote. Let the Senate kill it if they want to, and the people will fasten the responsibility where it belongs. [Applause.]

I see the article 675 on their free-list bill is "skeletons and other preparations of anatomy," and article 680 of the same free list is "spunk." [Laughter.] The people want to bury their own dead and enjoy the right of burying them in a decent manner and not be taxed to death by their Government for doing so. We are opposed to the skeleton business. Let the dead past bury its dead. We are turning to the future. The dawn of a new era is upon us. The old-time Jeffersonian Democratic principle of "equal rights to all and special privileges to none" is being rehabilitated, new recruits are falling into line, and the voice of the mighty is being heard upon the land as well as upon the high seas. History is repeating itself. There is a just God who still lives in Israel, and the curse of the American people is now being visited upon the trusts and special interests, which have grown so powerful that they own the stand-pat element of the Republican party—body, boots, and breeches; and I want to say here and now to this Congress and the American people that I believe it is the sense of this Congress that the patriotic element of the Republican Party of this country is found within the growing ranks of the insurgent or progressive element of that great party. [Prolonged applause.] And yet, if a toiling man feels imposed upon and undertakes to assert his God-given and constitutional rights, you standpatters have made it possible for a tyrannical employer to enjoin him and made it impossible for him to enjoy the benefits of that constitutional right which provides that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law and the judgment of his peers. Away with your free-spunk idea. You profess one thing and practice another. All men are presumed to be created free and upon an equality before the law. Yet you would encourage him to be spunky and have his spunk free, too, and at the same time put him in jail if he follows your advice.

Article 650 on this free list is "tar and pitch of wood," not produced by the trusts, but the people say they can not live upon tar and pitch of wood, but they are now going to burn tar all over the anatomy of the Aldrich and Cannon wing of the G. O. P. [Continued applause.]

The next article—696—on their free list is "tobacco stems"—after the leaf is stripped off and controlled by the powerful and wealthy Tobacco Trust, which fixes the price of tobacco so high that men are chewing yellow root of the woodland rather than enjoy a good chew of tobacco or smoke even a Wheeling stogie. The tariff is so high that people can not afford to enjoy such luxuries. They have lately offered poor men free of duty "tobacco stems." Oh, my, how generous in these old days, when men of all parties are after you. [Long applause.]

The next item I find, page 78, on their free list is "turpentine"—not a trust article. All I have to say is that the people commenced in November, 1910, and they will complete the job in 1912. [Great applause and continued laughter.]

One more word, as my time has nearly run. As to Canadian reciprocity, statistics show that during the past five years we sold in Canada nearly $500,000,000 worth more of agriculture and general products—principally agriculture—of the United States than Canada sold to us. This was made up of wheat, corn, oats, rye, barley, hogs, cattle, horses, sheep, mules, goats, farming implements, machinery, coal, coke, oil, clothing, and everything we produce. Canada has her tariff the same as we have. We have 92,000,000 people; Canada about 7,000,000, of whom nearly 1,800,000 emigrated from the United States, have made their homes there, and they want to enjoy reciprocal trade relations with us. We have everything to gain and comparatively nothing to lose. We have redeemed our pledge and complied with instructions. I am a farmer also, and that which will promote the interest of my farms will help my neighbor farmer. Where does the principal opposition come from—the Paper Trust? I would rather vote for the city and country newspapers and magazines that they might get rid of the tariff on paper and be enabled to give the people reading matter on reasonable terms than vote for any trust I have ever been oppressed by. [Loud and long applause.]

Your high tariff has lived out its usefulness in this country. The "baby" has grown and thrived off of the fat of the land until it has become incorrigible, oppressive, tyrannical, humiliating everywhere and abusive even to its mother, until the neighbors are all mad. The neighbors and even members of the same family have disagreed and are ready to fight, and you will see a battle royal fought in 1912. The people against the trust. The baby (now giant) will meet his first and final Waterloo at the hands of the Democratic host, aided by insurgent or progressive Republicans and patriotic men all over this land. Men are determined to and will have a fair deal. Babylon fell; the Roman Empire was humiliated; France had her bloody revolution; Napoleon, the greatest general of all, was exiled; Mexico her internal strife—all because of oppression. [Applause.] Ireland—God speed the day when she wins her independence. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.] Not the old but the new Aldrich, Payne, Cannon, Commercial Republican Party, now of trust and special interests, is falling at the hands of a suffering Christian people, regardless of servitude or previous conditions, and great will be the fall thereof. We are a reunited, aggressive (in the interest of all the people), irresistible, yet sane and courageous Democracy. We must sit steady in the boat. [Long and tumultuous applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The House will please come to order. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FARR].

[Mr. FARR addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN].

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, there seem to be Members. Members everywhere, but mighty few are here. Now, that is perhaps looked upon with different sentiments. The older Members undoubtedly would miss the crowd. We younger and more timid ones escape the crowd and congratulate ourselves.

The course of many Republican Members on this side of the House, in support of the Canadian pact, impliedly invites us to the utmost independence and freedom of action on this measure. From the other side has come emphatic oral invitations to support this bill as a companion bill to the reciprocity measure. Whether that companionship is regular and legitimate or is a mere illicit affinity will hereafter be determined. Of that pact the Chicago Republican platform of 1908 did not advise the public; neither did the Democratic platform at Denver warn the people.

With these considerations I have listened to the invitations from across the way. Several were delivered very courteously. One I remember was hurled at us like a projectile from a 400-pound Kentucky catapult. He was as fierce about it as was old Daniel Boone in battle with a "painter" and the "varmint" showing fight. The third was the gentleman from Alabama with a mingled invitation and warning in that peculiar and humorous fourteenth-amendment dialect. It sounded like the entertainment of a minstrel end man and left one in doubt as to whether it was to be heeded or simply heard, enjoyed, and ignored.

In deliberating on this invitation I have considered several matters. You are the party in power. If we had not read it in the papers, we would have heard it here. I listened to all the debates of this session, and 23 gentlemen solemnly referred in orotund voice to Democracy's being "intrusted with power." Whether you were intrusted with power or whether it was simply taken away from the Republicans, and being left around loose and you happening to be there, gobbled it, I do not know. You have frequently referred to your large majority and our depleted ranks. I presume the extraordinary modesty as to what you propose to do to us and to the country is owing to your careful consideration of the way that the people, of whom we have heard so much in your speeches, saw fit to vote. You undoubtedly have well considered that the total number of votes cast for the several Members of the majority amounted to 3,607,410, while the total number of votes cast for the several Members of the minority amounted to 3,425,033, a difference of only 182,377, as the affirmative expression of the people; that in this classification your vote amounted to 51⅛ per cent; ours, 48⅞ per cent; a little wider than the Canadian line; no wider, relatively, than the aisle which divides us.

If we eliminate those States congressionally undebatable—that is, those which change for neither rhyme nor reason—the total number of votes cast for the majority Members herein would be 3,079,737, and the total number of votes cast for the minority Members would be 3,344,317; your vote was 47½ per cent; ours 52½ per cent. In this classification I refer to certain States that can not be moved by rhyme and others that can not be swayed by reason.

At the election last fall the total votes cast for the Democratic candidates for Congress was 5,721,580, and that for the Republican candidates was 5,592,814, the Democratic plurality being only 128,766, or 1 per cent of the votes cast for the candidates of the two parties. While the total votes cast for the Democratic candidates for Congress was 5,721,580, the total opposition vote was 6,320,180, and of the whole vote cast for all candidates for Congress the Democrats lacked 598,600 of a majority. The Democratic candidates received only 47½ per cent of the total votes cast.

However, if you have anything on your bargain counter in the interest of my agricultural and live-stock district, I shall be pleased to invest, regardless of party lines, but I want to be reasonably sure that the investment will be an asset and not a liability. The new system of government by caucus has few points ahead of government by injunction. The latter always involves some evidence and a measure of deliberation. It does not, like the former, include only organization, discipline, and execution. For that reason I approach the matter cautiously, so as to know whether you want to divide something with us or want us to help you bear some burden.

Your bill for which you ask support is charged on this side, and practically admitted on the other, to be the means of redress for the wrong or damage of the Canadian pact. A sort of "hush money" for the injury committed. What are its claims? It will deprive the Treasury of $10,000,000 of revenue. That is scarcely a virtue. The real claim of every speaker on that side seems to be that it will save money for the farmers; hence it is called "the farmers' free-list bill." If it stands that test, in the interest of my district I shall vote for it.

The average farmer in my district pays out, on the average, for lumber, shoes, harness, fence wire, salt, and sewing machines two to four hundred dollars annually. He produces grain, which goes into flour, meal, and so forth, and live stock, which is converted into meats, in the sum of $1,000 to $2,000. The same law and logic by which you would cheapen these articles to the farmer when he purchases would cheapen the other articles when he went to sell, the taking off of the tariff being your only modifying cause.

It would effect the saving in fresh and preserved meats, flour, grit, cereals, and so forth, $151,848,718 says the New York World, quoting from the advocates of the law. My personal estimate would make it many millions more. That is based upon the supply now. As our raw products must be sold to corporate and private combines and independent concerns which will reduce them to the form above named, it does not take much of a philosopher in business to see who will lose that $151,848,718, and when we consider that the relatively larger portion of this loss must fall on the farmers and live-stock men of the Northwest, and when we recall that that amount is more than one-half of all the saving to all the people through the United States on all the articles named in this bill, the man who says it is not sectional, or that it is really in the interests of the farmer, is in a mighty close row of stumps. How much of that $151,848,718 loss would have to be borne by Boston, New York City, and that part of the country lying south of the Ohio and east of the Mississippi? Why not be frank about it and say it is sectional, intended to be so? Say further, "This bill was not intended to be for the farmers, but the farmers are getting more than they are entitled to. In our combination we have the votes and we are going to make them divide." There seems to be a little reciprocity in this bill, but it is reciprocity like the fish giving its body to the barbed hook for the toothsome angleworm. There is more bondage than freedom in that farmers' free-list bill. [Applause on the Republican side.] There is some alliteration which seems to help the sound, but if alliteration is all you want prefix the word "fraudulent" to the name, viz, "Fraudulent farmers' free list," and you will have more alliteration and incidentally more truth. [Applause on the Republican side.] I must decline to vote for this bill in its entirety. I do not want to violate the pure-food law, which requires the label to correspond with the goods. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I received a letter the other day from a friend in which, among other things, he discussed the bill now under debate. He said it reminded him of a gun which a Yankee was trying to sell to an Irishman. He said, "Pat, this gun will shoot two kinds of shot and in two directions. These small shot will go out at the barrel, the slugs will go out at the breech." Says Pat, "The small shot will go out at the barrel—that is where the bird is, isn't it?" "Yes." "And the slugs will come out at the breech; that is, where I would be?" "Yes." "Well, that is bigger game than I am hunting for, so keep your gun. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

The public is wondering what farmer in the caucus or what farmers' organization from outside recommended that the meat and cereal schedules of this bill be made a part of a favoring farmers' free list.

Now, if you want to do a little proselyting for your bill, strike out the meat and cereal schedules, which include the products of nearly 90 per cent of the northwestern farmers' annually produced wealth; make it in deed what you have named it and you will obtain some assistance from this side. As it stands now the farmers' free list is a misnomer. "What's in a name?" To paraphrase the inspired William, "Dog fennel by any other name would smell just as loud." [Applause on the Republican side.]

You can remedy this, and strictly within the rules of the game. I appeal to Cæsar for the benefits of the imperial procedure announced at the Baltimore winter meeting. That was an event not wholly forgotten nor, perhaps, forgiven. I note they cut down the Democratic majority in Baltimore the other day several thousand on account of it. It was given out by the press that tariff changes contemplated would be schedule by schedule. When so tried, no schedule would be played against another, and logrolling would be eliminated. I have not heard it alleged that the press was misinformed. In any event, I have asked by bills, and now in the hands of the Ways and Means Committee, for the articles favorable to the farmers to be placed on the free list, and shall ask the benefit of the schedule-by-schedule treatment of our grains and live-stock products. We do not want to be tried with those shoe fellows, and I thought the party which said "equal rights to all and special privileges to none" would not deny the farmers and stockmen what you propose giving to the wool, cotton, and steel people. You can eliminate by amendment these two schedules from the bill and redeem your Baltimore promise. You can not refuse to do so without violating that pledge. You can do this also without embarrassment, as the defenders of other schedules have not to my knowledge asked the separation.

I am reminded that the cereals are controlled by the trusts. That certainly can not be correct, because when everything else was being thrown wide open in which the farmer was interested, the majority would not have closed the door to that little sweetening which might have come in in the various crackers, breads, and so forth, involved in the following quotation from this bill: "Biscuits, bread, wafers, and similar articles not sweetened." That would have been an excellent opportunity to have swatted the Sugar Trust.

But that "linked sweetness, long drawn out," from a bakery on a free-trade shore through our ports to the American farmer's palate was all too sweet a boon to be given him whose prosperity is being assailed at every turn of this congressional road. [Applause on the Republican side.] That exception is a companion piece to the exception of ebony from the lumber free list. That was explained by a facetious Democrat from our southern border, where the American ebony trees grow, "That exception is made to show that we protect whatever is black." [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.] For a similar reason rosewood and mahogany were excepted, so that the speeches prepared with the time-honored cradle, altar, coffin, antiprotection perorations might not have to be changed.

I wish to speak especially of the meat schedule, because that, in point of value and volume, affects my State more than anything else, excepting, of course, grain and its products. It is the policy of our people, in order to save and conserve the soil, rich and fertile, which has been wrested from an apparent desert, to encourage live-stock and dairy products instead of drain and waste of grain raising. Meat constitutes the largest product of the animal. In the bovine species hides constitute the second. The reduction in value of any large part will reduce the value of the entirety. I assume this to be true, for a number of reasons. First, the Committee on Ways and Means so considered it, or the tariff would not be taken off meats in this bill.

Again, the last 18 months have demonstrated that the taking of the duty off hides not only reduced the value of the hides, but relatively reduced the value of the steer. You will recall that the Payne tariff bill removed the duty from cattle hides. Several gentlemen on this floor referred to the advance in value of hides after the removal of the duty. That statement is not economically correct. Following the passage of that bill there was a magnificent advance in everything that the farmer and cattle raiser produced, and that advance was fairly well maintained until some six months ago, when it became apparent that the country's tariff policy was to be changed, or at least unsettled.

It might be said in passing that for the first year after the passage of the Payne bill the farmers and live-stock raisers of this country enjoyed unprecedented prosperity. The bill itself, of course, was not above criticism; but it is unlike the old Wilson bill, which was beneath criticism, subject only to condemnation. See President Cleveland's reason for not signing. I would not work up your feelings against the dead.

In the advance of meats following the passage of the Payne Act, anyone familiar with the course of prices knows that beef advanced less and more slowly than poultry, mutton, or pork. In these last three there had been no material assault on any of their factors. Further, the price of cattle made a strong, substantial, and continuous general advance, while the price of hides advanced slightly for a brief period and then subsided and declined. After six months on the free list hides had dropped $2 per hundred and have never since been within $2 of the price commanded August 4, 1909. A comparison of price of hides week by week and quarter by quarter, with the average price of steers at Omaha market on cattle, of which I am a patron, shows that during the period of advance of cattle and hides the average per cent of advance on cattle was about 14 per cent more than the advance of hides, and when prices began to decline the decline of price of hides was an average of about 14 per cent greater than the decline of cattle, showing the market price of each article on or about August 4, 1909, as a basis for percentage and that date as the focal date. These figures, together with my observation from time to time, being interested in those markets, convinces me that the removal of the duty from hides reduced the value of that particular product and also reduced the value proportionately of cattle. Why was it reduced? I note the importation of hides for a year preceding the removal of the tariff to be $20,344,974.68; for the year after, $49,803,231.82. The Government lost on revenue $3,034,735.62, and every cattle owner lost in value of his property or the prices obtained in the market about 14 per cent of the hide value, amounting to from 50 cents to $2 per head. Not being aware that this loss entirely went to American workmen, and being convinced that it did not go to the shoe wearers, I would be willing to put the shoe manufacturer of the East on the same basis as the manufacturer of hides in the West.

Prices of hides and steers August 4, 1909, and every three months following, and the increased or decreased price as related to August 4, 1909; the per cent of increase or decrease each three months to the original price; and the total per cent of increase or decrease for the six periods of three months each following August 4, 1909:

Price of steers: "Good to choice beef steers," as given in Omaha Bee for South Omaha.

But I have not discussed this hide proposition merely to rebuke the shoe manufacturers. I think it demonstrates this further important fact to the cattle owners and raisers that the duty removed from not only beef but pork and mutton and other forms of meat will largely reduce the value of their holdings and the selling price of cattle, hogs, and sheep. The charge is made now against the meats, just as was made under the Payne bill against the hides, that they are controlled by the trusts. No one would go further than I in punishing a trust or in curbing its power. But when I taught school I was not one of those sentimental pedagogues who, in administering a punishment, assured the subject that it was hurting me more than it was him. [Laughter on the Republican side.] In cases of that kind the young culprit always escaped, and I do not believe in the system now that in order to punish a trust we must wound or slay ourselves. During the year following the removal of the duty from hides, from the plains of Argentina, Mexico, and Canada came vast shipments through our free ports of those foreign hides, and the American producer, with his valuable lands and in his inclement climate, where shelter must be provided and expensive labor paid for the care of his cattle, was compelled to compete for the American market to the home producers' financial loss. In Argentina, with its mild climate and the broad pampas clothed with luxuriant grass; on the vast open areas of Australia and New Zealand; and on the hillsides and valleys of Mexico, where lands are cheap, where shelter is inexpensive, where labor is poorly paid, graze countless millions of cattle and sheep, with the means already established for their slaughter. They are to be loaded and shipped to the most inviting port. Where will they find it? The greatest meat eaters of the world are in the United States. They are the people most able to purchase. More than that, their customhouses will not have to be settled with, while in nearly every other port a duty must be paid. Is there any question in anyone's mind as to who is going to suffer? Nay, more; if the Americans desire to compete in the world's market with their meat products, they may seek France and meet a duty there of an average of about 4½ cents per pound; in Germany they are held up for about 4 cents per pound. Should they seek our friend Canada on the north, they are met with the demand under our reciprocal arrangement for 1½ cents per pound. Even if they start across the Mexican border in an attempt to feed the various individuals engaged on either side of the riot going on down there, in order to enter their ports they must pay a duty of about 2½ cents per pound.

Whom do you think you are getting by doing this—the trusts you so abhor or the American farmer and cattle raiser? What grudge has the majority caucus against the farmer? Under the Payne bill they got our hides, under reciprocity you get our bullocks, and under this proposed law you will get our carcasses. Nothing left of profit to us, not even the tails; they went with the hides. And next you propose to get into our wool.

The inordinate desire to get these trusts at whatever expense reminds me of a story told by Joe Price, a neighbor, long since gone to his reward. Joe was a good-natured, prosperous individual. He had a happy home, and in the course of years was developing a Rooseveltian family. There came a time when, on consultation, it was concluded they might need the services of a maid, and Joe was commissioned to interview a possible candidate. Joe described the home, the work that was to be expected, wages to be paid, and her various privileges. She then began to cross-examine him, and the first question was, "How many children are there?" Joe answered, "Six, with prospects." [Laughter.] She said, "I will not work there while there are so many children." Joe retreated, telling her he would go and see what he could do. He came home and his wife asked him if he succeeded in employing the maid. He said, "Yes; on condition." "What is the condition?" Joe said, "That we kill off the children, and I didn't want to do that without consulting you." [Laughter.] I would like to assist you in getting these trusts. We ought to get them, but if by getting them we have to kill off or injure the two biggest industries of my State, I would like to consult with the people first. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Who are we legislating for? Is it for America and America's industries or is it for the foreigner and his investments? To make this matter a little more concrete, the American farmer and cattle raiser has forced from a reluctant soil and adverse conditions a development and prosperity that is satisfying to him and in which the country should take a national pride. He is a large buyer of the articles which pay tribute at our customhouse and liberally supports this Government. More than this, it has been many times asserted on the other side of the House that we will soon have an income tax, and when that comes, his property and income, open to inspection of the world, will bear more than their relative burdens to support this Government. Under this bill our Mexican friend from the south will have access to our markets free, contribute nothing to the support of our Government, and when the American farmer would cross the border to sell a surplus, whether Diaz, Madero, or some other unpronounceable rules, he is compelled to "stand and deliver" at the customhouse.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have two or three minutes more.

Mr. DALZELL. I yield to the gentleman three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. SLOAN. Do you desire to oppress the farmer; and, in doing so, do you place such a small estimate upon his intelligence as to think he can not see through the fallacies of this bill? It seems to me you are expressing more interest and favor to the Mexican greaser than you are to the American granger. As your bill stands now, you should not have the support of any farmer or cattle raiser, or anyone interested directly or indirectly in those lines. You will have to make a better bill and a different one before it will be a true farmers' free list. You have offered to us what you call the bread of life. Upon inspection we find it to be a poisoned sandwich. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] is recognized.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I have received two or three letters from Mr. C. W. Dickinson, a representative of the La Crosse Plow Co., of La Crosse, Wis. These letters deal particularly with the agricultural-implement problem and the production of implements abroad, especially in Canada. I do not fully agree with the sentiments therein expressed with reference to Canadian reciprocity, but the letters contain valuable information with regard to the foreign market for agricultural implements and the cost of their production. I therefore ask unanimous consent to print them in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. That leave has already been given.

Following are the letters referred to:

Hon. JOHN J. ESCH, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We understand that it will be the plan of the House at the present session of Congress to endeavor to put agricultural machinery upon the free list, largely to meet the views of the farmers and in partial compensation for what they think they will suffer because of the adoption of the reciprocity agreement with Canada. I trust you will not consider it out of place for me to give expression of opinion concerning that policy.

My own belief, after some study of the proposition, is that the farmers of the United States, for the same class and quality of agricultural machinery, are buying their agricultural implements cheaper than the farmers of any other section of the world, either of United States or domestic manufacture. I am well aware of the fact that there is a widespread impression that the contrary is the case. Yet I know that one of the largest manufacturers of agricultural machinery in the world for years took the position that they would not attempt to ship into the United States or to enter the United States for manufacturing purposes for the United States market, for the reason that the profits on agricultural machinery in the States was less than it is where they do manufacture, and that where they do manufacture the profits were less than they were in other portions of the world. That manufacturer is making practically the same class of machinery as is most generally in use in the United States, and it would stand to reason that if such be the case the American farmer is buying his machinery as cheap as he can, tariff or no tariff.

Now, we wish to be understood as not objecting in the slightest degree to taking off every penny of duty on machinery imported into the United States, providing the duty on all raw material entering into the manufacture of agricultural machinery is also removed and the manufacturers of the United States are given equal privileges in other countries largely manufacturing agricultural machinery. We believe, if the proposed measure be adopted, that the farmers of the United States will be very much disappointed at the result. But that feature of the case we will not discuss at this point.

What we contend at this point is that it would be the grossest kind of injustice for the United States to open its doors to a market comprising the farmer portion of 92,000,000 of people without any protective duties whatever and allow our competitors on the outside to keep up their tariff wall and keep the United States out of their own markets. More pointedly than any other country, I am referring to the Canadian market. There are several institutions in Canada manufacturing substantially the same class and grade of agricultural machinery as is manufactured and in general use in the United States who would become immediate competitors of the American manufacturers if they desired to accept what they themselves claim to be the narrow margins obtainable in the United States market. The Canadian market comprises the farming element of some six, or possibly seven, million people, but also a vast territory in the Canadian Northwest that is rapidly filling up, and to a considerable extent, with wide-awake, progressive American farmers; and to the extent that this market exists and grows it is desirable to the manufacturers of the United States as well as to the manufacturers of Canada. The Canadian farmers in the Northwest take more kindly to the very latest and most highly improved agricultural machinery more freely than do the farmers of any other portion of the world. It is a well-known fact that Canadian manufacturers have procured in the United States the most approved type of United States made machinery, taken them to their shops and duplicated them almost line for line and casting for casting, and marketed them to the Canadian farmers. The Canadian manufacturers are, in the main, the only manufacturers in the world of a class of agricultural machinery that would be satisfactory to the mass of the American farmers, and would therefore probably be about the only ones that would be competitors with the United States manufacturer. Of course, we do not know what competition might arise if all tariffs were removed and the French and German and English manufacturers were free to copy American models, and, with their cheap labor, manufacture for the American market; but as the condition is at present the Canadian manufacturers are the only ones making a line of machinery that would be satisfactory to the American farmer. Now, we submit, would it be justice to the United States manufacturer to open up his vast United States market to these Canadian manufacturers by throwing down the tariff cost of entering into the United States and permit the Canadian manufacturer to retain the protection of the 15 per cent duty against the import of the United States agricultural machinery into his market, comparatively limited as it is? That is, at the best, if the tariff wall were entirely eradicated in both directions the United States manufacturers would be gaining a market among approximately only 6,000,000, while the Canadian manufacturers would be gaining a market found among 92,000,000 people. Surely, it seems to the writer, that the American farmer could not ask that such a gross injustice should be imposed upon the United States manufacturer for the possible and hazy benefits he thinks he might secure by putting the agricultural implements upon the free list.

The writer supposes that the most ardent believer in free trade will concede that it is a distinct advantage to any community to have spent within its borders the money that may be put out in wages for manufacturing purposes, and that, even though the most pronounced free-trade principle should prevail in the United States, adherents of such a principle still would desire to see manufacturing in the United States highly prospering.

We call attention to the fact that in the past few years, and we presume largely on account of the 15 per cent differential that the British colonies give to each other, some of the largest manufacturers of the United States have built vast manufacturing plants in Canada for the purpose of supplying the Canadian market, and incidentally, perhaps, other British colonies favored by the 15 per cent differential, and pay out large sums of money in wages that are being spent within the Canadian lines, and thus building up the Dominion of Canada, all of which is, in the main, directly at the expense of the interests of the United States. That is, had a reciprocity agreement been made with Canada years ago at the time Canada itself was a beggar for the reciprocal agreement the efflux of United States manufacturers and wages into Canada would never have taken place. Several large manufacturers of agricultural machinery were among the number flitting to Canada. Now, if such loss of United States manufacturing, and of wages paid in the United States, has accrued to the benefit of Canada under the tariffs as they had been during the past few years, it is wise to ask the question, What will occur if the United States puts agricultural machinery absolutely on the free list while Canada retains its tariff wall against the manufacturers of the United States? Unquestionably, except so far as freights might modify the proposition, it would be to the interest of every manufacturer in the United States to move over to Canada and get the benefit of what Canadian market he can without duty, to get the benefits of the trade with the British colonies allowing the 15 per cent differential, and he can retain his United States trade just the same as he had it before, inasmuch as he would have no duty to pay for shipping his Canadian-made goods to his United States customers. The writer knows of two quite large concerns that have been very seriously considering in the recent past the project of entering Canada for manufacturing purposes, and he knows that one of the concerns has been approached by at least two different localities in Canada with the offer of large inducements to establish manufacturing plants within the Dominion.

If the present conditions had been sufficient to cause careful consideration of such a proposition, we think you can see that the condition as it would exist by throwing down the United States tariff wall and leaving the Canadian tariff wall standing, would be to cause such concerns to clinch the proposition and move out of the United States; and with them would go large investments of capital in the United States and large payments of wages to employees, which are now distributed in the United States.

The newspapers reported within the past few days the reorganization of one of the large United States manufacturers, and the statement that a Canadian factory has been included in the deal and that there will be an immense enlargement of the Canadian factory for the purpose of manufacturing for the Canadian market.

We wish to assert again that, while we do not object on general principles to putting agricultural implements on the free list, we do most strenuously object to the principle of opening up the United States market for the benefit of our Canadian neighbors and permitting them to retain their tariff against the United States manufacturers. We believe that it would be one of the greatest economic mistakes into which the United States has ever blundered.

While it is not exactly germane to the subject, it might not be amiss to take some notice of what is alleged to be a widespread belief that there is an Agricultural Implement Trust, inasmuch as some people have acted and there has been legislation proposed in the belief that such a thing exists. As a matter of fact, there is no more a trust in the manufacture of agricultural machinery than there is in the breathing of air; and no investigation that was ever made has ever been able to unearth even the remotest appearance of such a trust. There is neither trust, combination, or other device for controlling the manufacture or the price of agricultural machinery. This concern has absolutely no interest in or with the International Harvester Co. beyond being direct competitors with them in the manufacture of several lines of agricultural machinery. But the International Harvester Co. is only one of several manufacturers of harvesting machinery that is in direct competition with them in harvesting goods. Possibly they control by manufacture the market for a very large percentage of harvesting machinery, but outside of harvesting machinery they neither manufacture nor control more than a very small portion of the other agricultural machinery used by farmers. Deere & Co., of Moline, are probably one of the two largest manufacturers of plows, including cultivators, harrows, and some other lines of farm machinery, in the United States, and have recently reorganized their subsidiary concerns, consisting of their own branch houses and their own separate factory heretofore existing under separate forms of organization, and I understand have also bought outright one of the largest manufacturers of hay tools in the United States, but which Deere & Co. were not heretofore manufacturing. But it is shrewdly surmised on the part of other manufacturers and very large competitors of Deere & Co. that the underlying motive for this consolidation is that they may be in better shape to enter the list as a direct and powerful competitor of the International Harvester Co. in its strongest line, namely, harvesting machinery.

But there are many large and powerful manufacturers who are the direct competitors of both the International Harvester Co. and of Deere & Co. outside of the harvesting line, without a single community of interest except those general interests which pertain to all people engaged in the same line of business. They are all direct, active, and progressive competitors of each other and of Deere & Co. and the International Harvester Co., except as to harvesting machinery which they do not manufacture and in the sale of which, as a rule, they have absolutely no interest.

To one who understands the actual conditions the idea of there being anything that in the remotest degree approaches a trust or a combination or a monopoly in agricultural machinery is absurd. We suppose the International Harvester Co. is abundantly able to take care of themselves—at least they seem to be able to do so without any help from us—but whatever may be the character of their organization, beneficial or otherwise to the consumers of the United States, the fact remains that they are an entity by themselves and should be judged upon the merits of their own institution, just as we claim we are entitled to be judged by the merits of our own institution, and the attempt should not be made to couple them with the other and independent manufacturers of agricultural machinery in the United States.

I thank you cordially for such attention as you may be able to give my presentation of free listing agricultural implements for the benefit of the farmers of the United States, and if there is any question that you desire to ask of me that I am able to answer I shall be very glad to give it to you freely.

I might say further that this company does not have one dollar of trade with Canada.

Yours, truly,

C. W. DICKINSON.

LA CROSSE PLOW CO. (INC.),
La Crosse, Wis., April 27, 1911.

Hon. JOHN J. ESCH, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have your esteemed favor of the 24th instant in re H. R. 4412.

Yes; I heartily indorse the reciprocity bill as it was submitted by the President, believing—

First. That every phase of the subject had been very carefully thought out by very competent people on behalf of the United States and in the belief, at least of the gentlemen who negotiated the agreement, every interest had been carefully protected.

Second. That I have not been able yet to be convinced that the interests of the farmers will be prejudiced by the adoption of the agreement as submitted.

Third. That the time to secure a reciprocity agreement is when both parties can be brought together. I have heretofore laid before you the information I got in two or three trips through the manufacturing end of Canada, in which I found a very hostile and growing sentiment against any reciprocity agreement with the United States unless the United States pay very heavily for the privilege as compared with what they would have had to pay at the time Canada was a suppliant for an agreement and was refused on the part of the United States. It is my belief, if the agreement is not cinched at this time, that at any future time an agreement may be sought the development of Canada will put her in position to demand very much more from the United States than it is demanding in this agreement. Canada has not, in this agreement, yielded very much to the manufacturers of the United States, and undoubtedly, under the existing regulations, the already rapid development of the manufacturing interests of Canada will go on apace. This is evidenced by the fact that, notwithstanding the pending treaty, one of the largest plow manufacturers in the United States, if not the largest, has consummated arrangements whereby a Canadian plant that comes to them in the deal is to be very greatly enlarged for the manufacturing of their goods in Canada.

I think you have possibly misunderstood my letter as seeking to retain protection for the American manufacturer of agricultural machinery. I was born in the hotbed of protection, have always believed, and do yet, in the theory of protection. But I have always felt that whenever any industry in the United States is able to get out and compete in the markets of the world for trade, while still paying United States wages, the time has passed when that industry needs protection. I believe, in the main, that the United States manufacturer of agricultural machinery is competing in the markets of the world, but not so much in quantity or in price as in quality. At any rate, the La Crosse Plow Co. is perfectly willing to take its chances in holding its business in the United States whether the duty on farm machinery be retained or abolished. We were satisfied, however, with the treaty, although we could not hold it to be a perfect product. We very rarely get such things in negotiations. There has to be give and take.

But the "free list" is an entirely different proposition, even as regards agricultural implements. In opposing the free list so far as pertains to farm machinery we are not doing it because we object per se to farm machinery being placed on the free list, but that it would be closing the door to ever getting Canada to put farm machinery on its free list. Here is the opportunity for a trade, and for Congress to omit this opportunity is what I would call a most serious economic blunder. And I believe you see the full force of my reasoning in that respect; that you see that if farm machinery is placed on the free list and Canada maintains its duty of 15 per cent, as fixed in the reciprocity agreement, it would be to the advantage of every United States manufacturer to pull up his plant and put it in Canada, because he would have all of the advantages of the protective duty of 15 per cent in Canada and would be able to ship his product as freely into the United States as when his factory is located in the United States. If United States manufacturers have found it advantageous to erect in Canada expensive plants and invest large amounts of money in transacting Canadian business, and possibly business with the British colonies, and with the attendant advantages of the expenditure of large sums of money in wages, how much more emphatic will be the inducement for them to follow that plan when Canada retains a 15 per cent duty and the United States takes the duty all off.

But, in my judgment, the farmers of the United States will not get $1 of advantage in putting farm machinery on the free list. They certainly will not so far as getting Canadian-made machinery is concerned. In my judgment, it will cost the United States manufacturer in Canada as much to produce his goods as it does now in the United States. Labor may be cheap, but it is nowhere near as effective. The Canadian manufacturer in the main buys his materials from the United States rolling mills and has to pay the duty. His freights are about the same as the United States manufacturer has to pay. To be sure, they allow the British rolling mills the preferential duty of 15 per cent, but neither the British nor German or other European rolling mills put out a product that is nearly as available for agricutural machinery as do the rolling mills of the United States. We have never bought any foreign iron and steel, but I know a very large concern manufacturing cars that did try it on and found there was such an inaccuracy in the rolling as to make the stock practically unsuitable for their purpose.

I state again what I have said before, that one of the largest manufacturers of agricultural machinery in the world, and making probably as large a line of variety of machinery as does the International Harvester Co., refused to enter the United States for manufacturing purposes for the reason that the prices in the United States were unattractive to it as compared with the prices that we are getting in their own country and in other foreign countries. That is evidence enough that the prices are already as low in the United States as the United States farmer can hope to secure. But, in addition to that, of course, we have to know very well what the limits of profits are in our own business.

But in addition to this line of reasoning is this, that it is of no possible interest to the United States farmer whether or not the United States manufacturer gets into the Canadian market free of duty—whether or not the United States farmer has to compete against the Canadian grain raiser, that feature of the case is of no possible financial interest to him. If the United States tariff on Canadian-raised grain is entirely taken away he has to compete, if there is competition, no matter at what price, the Canadian farmer buys his machinery. That competition will be the same whether the Canadian farmer gets his United States-made goods with or without a duty. It will neither enhance nor lower the price of his grain, that there is or is not a Canadian duty on United States-made machinery. Neither is it a financial interest to the United States farmer that the Canadian farmer gets his United States-made farm machinery with or without a duty, even if the United States farmer is protected by duty on grain, meats, and other products.

The whole problem, therefore, as to machinery on the free list is one involving the interests of the United States manufacturer to get into the Canadian market on the same terms that the Canadian manufacturer gets into the United States. And I can not see that it has anything to do at all with the fate of the reciprocity agreement. I do not feel competent to discuss the merits of the other articles on the free list. I am not sufficiently acquainted with their markets in this country and abroad. I do feel that I know a little something about farm machinery.

I do not know that it is necessary to discuss the reports that seem to be circulating so freely in the congressional halls in regard to the selling of United States-made machinery in foreign markets at much less prices than the same machines sell, in the United States. I recollect that some years ago there was a report made to Congress that United States-made harvesting machinery was selling for a very large percentage less in some foreign countries than it sells in the United States. Later information came to me that in instituting this comparison of prices a harvester with a grain-binder attachment was the basis of prices in the United States and an old-fashioned reaper with no binder attachment, and that can scarcely be sold in any section of the United States at any figure, in use in foreign countries, was the standard for the foreign price. I do know this, and everyone may know it who takes the trouble to post himself, that there are large sections of foreign countries which prefer to use a harvesting machine of the reaper type rather than to pay the price for an up-to-date fully equipped binder machine.

A statement was made, either in a report or in a speech in the House about a week ago, that wagons that sell in the United States for $135 and $150 (I am not positive which of the figures was named, but the United States price was very, very much higher) sell in foreign countries for $100. The inference was that the statement referred to ordinary farm wagons. I know something about wagons. We and our branch houses and agencies sell the entire output of the Smith Manufacturing Co.

For a long period, when I was sales manager, it was my business to fix the dealers' prices on wagons. Our Mr. Levis, now sales manager, was for a long time sales manager for a wagon company, selling goods all over the United States and in Canada. We neither of us know of any place in the United States where an ordinary farm wagon retails for as much as $100, the price, it was claimed, the wagons sell for in the foreign countries, and for which from 25 to 50 per cent greater price was asked in the United States. It is among the possibilities that in the extreme West, where the freights are very high and where the dealer has a cinch on the trade, the retail price of an ordinary farm wagon, say, 3-inch skein, with a 2-inch tire, ⅝ inch thick, would retail for $100, possibly some more, but we do not know of any such place.

Mr. Levis traveled over Canada, selling wagons to the jobbing trade, and was thoroughly familiar with the Canadian prices. He states to me that his price to the Canadian dealer was invariably the same price at the factory as the United States dealer pays, and it costs the Canadian dealer the freight and the duty. And he further states—what in a general way I know to be true—that the price of the Canadian manufacturer is the United States price plus the freight and the duty.

The Mexican market could secure its wagons by car shipment, and the price there would be dependent upon the factory price plus the freight and whatever duty there may be. But in the rest of the world the foreign market must pay not only the factory cost and profit and the freight, but also for the complete boxing of the wagon, to bring it within the requirements of ocean shipments, and the freight on that boxing. How utterly unreasonable, then, was the assumption that a wagon of given dimensions could be sold anywhere in the world at a less price than it can be or is sold in the United States. You are an ex-farmer, and you know that when you bought wagons you took into consideration differences in size of skeins, width of tire, the way the wagon was ironed up, etc. While I was handling the sales department I had difficulty with my travelers reporting competitive prices in the trade, in that they were very, very apt to leave out the specifications of construction of the wagons and make their comparison on the naked basis of prices alone. And many and many a time I have shown the traveler that his dealer, in order to beat down his price, was comparing the price of a 3-inch skein, 3 by ⅝ inch tire wagon, with our wagon, with 3¼-inch skein, 3 by ¼ inch tire, and other dimensions larger, heavier, and more costly in proportion. Any reports of prices on wagons in foreign countries and the United States, you can see, would have to be weighed with a great deal of caution for the same reason.

You probably know that there is a wagon put up for the large farmers of the West and Northwest, made very, very heavy, to haul very heavy loads, provided with a grain tank, built of planks with extended sides over the wheels, like some of our coal wagons, requiring very heavy ironing, all to adapt it to hauling in one wagon what would require two or more ordinary farm wagons to carry. It would be a very easy thing for some one who is not up on wagons to find that such a wagon sells, as it might reasonably do, freights considered, in some parts of the West, at $125 or $135, and in his ignornance compare that price with the price in some other quarter of the world on an ordinary farm wagon. You can see, therefore, the necessity of scrutinizing any report of that kind with the utmost vigilance.

Reverting to the reciprocity agreement itself, of course we understand, and you do, too, that any modification on the part of the United States means the killing of the agreement. It would have to go through another process of negotiation in order to embody in it any attempted reformation of the document. I do not wish to be understood that there are not manufacturers of farm machinery who would object to putting machinery on the free list per se. Of course it would follow as a matter of course that if we find ourselves unable to compete with foreign manufacturers we must immediately make the endeavor to put ourselves in position to do so. At the present time the Canadian manufacturer is the only one, we believe, in the world who makes a grade of goods that approaches United States standard of perfection, and it is for that reason largely that we are not fearing the placing of farm machinery on the free list. We find it hard enough to meet the high standard required by the United States farmer as it is, and do not fear that any of the low-grade machinery made by other foreign manufacturers than the Canadian is going to interest him. Of course, we do not know what English and German manufacturers might do when we throw down the bars and they copy our models and manufacture with their cheap labor, and freights from the foreign country are made to the Missouri River jobbing points, the Twin Cities, Denver, etc., as low as the freight rates are made from, say, the manufacturing concerns in Ohio to the same points. But that is a contingency that we believe will finally adjust itself.

Yours, truly,

C. W. DICKINSON.

Hon. JOHN J. ESCH,
Congress Hall, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In a recent letter I called your attention to the improbability of the statement that wagons are selling for a less price in foreign countries than they do in the United States—meaning a wagon of the same weight, ironing, etc., all having a bearing on the merits of the selling price of wagons in the United States, and to some extent having a bearing on the price of farm machinery generally in the United States and foreign countries.

The secretary of one of the very largest wagon companies refutes the proposition. He says he does not know of a farm wagon selling anywhere in the United States for $100—the price it is claimed they were selling for in foreign countries. It is possible the speakers or the committee were referring to a spring wagon, which is a pleasure vehicle and, strictly speaking, not a farm wagon at all, and the varieties of style, finish, etc., in which such spring wagons or pleasure vehicles are put up are multitudinous, and it would be impossible for a man to compare prices in two different countries without having the wagons before him, and then he would have to be an expert.

But as touching the price at which wagons sell in the United States and the innuendo of enormous profits in manufacturing wagons, my correspondent calls attention to the fact that in the last seven years in the neighborhood of 20 wagon factories have either busted or gone out of business, and he says there is not a place in the United States where the International Harvester Co. could obtain as much as $100 for any farm wagon they build.

Yours, truly,

C. W. DICKINSON.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. J. M. C. SMITH].

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I stand for protection to the American laborer and the American manufacturer. [Applause on the Republican side.] I was elected upon the Republican ticket. I was not sent here to take part in constructive legislation for the benefit of any other country. I can not support the measure which is now receiving the consideration of this House. It is called the farmers' free-list bill. That is a misnomer. The whole bill, from beginning to end, rings with a principle that would encourage foreign manufacturing, and that should be the title of it.

I as a Republican have no right to complain of the action of the majority, for they are in control of the legislation of this House, and it has been announced by the friends of the bill that it would be put through the House just as it is presented. No Member can vote on any item in this bill separately, but must vote for it as a whole. By the Canadian reciprocity pact a duty of $1.25 is removed from lumber. Salt is upon the free list. There was no duty placed on fence posts by the Payne-Aldrich Act, so that you see some of the articles are already on the free list. Hides are already on the free list, and the benefit accruing to the farmer by this measure will in no manner compensate him for his loss. But I know that much talking is useless and will avail nothing.

The bill has a catchy title, "to place on the free list," and its purpose is to admit free of duty beef, veal, mutton, lamb, pork, and meats of all kinds, buckwheat flour, corn meal, wheat flour and semolina, rye flour, and other similar products of the farm.

It also presents a number of manufactured articles to be admitted free into this country, and I claim that it is unfair.

What is the purpose of admitting manufactured articles into this country free of duty, when you must pay a duty upon the same manufactured articles if you undertake to sell them in any other country? I say that the law as it stands now is one which will permit every country on the globe to ship into this country free of duty these manufactured articles which the farmers use, provided that that country is willing to allow the same articles of American manufacture to be shipped free into its territory, and nothing can be fairer than that.

This bill is a blow at the live-stock industry of this country, which is one of the principal money getters of the American farmer. Last year the value of cattle alone in this country was estimated at $717,000,000 and upward, sheep more than $332,000,000, and swine $436,000,000 and over. If you destroy the market of the farmer for his live stock, how can he buy farm implements? But you say that we must reduce the cost of living, and to do so you would destroy this great American industry.

The title of this bill, as I say, is catchy. It is styled the farmers' free list. This is a misnomer; it properly should be styled "A bill for the encouragement of foreign manufacturing"; and it will not and does not allow or pretend to give to the American laboring man a single day's work. Every day's work put upon the articles imported under it will rob the American laborer of a day's work and send the pay therefor to foreign countries. It is absolutely against the interest of American labor and is of direct force and benefit to foreign labor. You can not have products manufactured in foreign countries and furnish labor to the workmen of this country. Neither will it bring the benefit to the American farmer that is intended, although you may reap the political effect. The farmers of my district are, generally speaking, protectionists, and they, together with their Democratic brothers, will see that there is no benefit in this bill, either to them or the masses whom it is sought to benefit. Indeed, they will see and realize directly the contrary, and that the wholesaler or possibly the retailer is the one to reap the profit. None of the farmers of my district purchase directly from the foreign manufacturer.

Foreign-made goods are first purchased by the wholesaler, who in turn sells to the retailer, who sells to the farmer, so that all the bill will accomplish will be that the wholesaler may purchase his goods made by foreign pauper labor cheaper; but that the farmer will purchase this foreign-made product any cheaper after it has passed through the hands of the wholesaler and the retailer is very problematical.

This bill is intended to make the American manufacturer sit up and take notice, and upon this floor and in this Chamber speeches are made by our Democratic friends on the other side which, in effect, if not so calculated, tend to discourage, impede, and destroy the business of every manufacturer and manufacturing establishment in our land. Why is the business of the manufacturer and the producer so berated? Is the business not legitimate? Is a man an enemy of his country because he employs labor? Do the Democrats of this great lawmaking body want to destroy the manufacturing institutions of our land, and want all our products manufactured in foreign countries? What encouragement is there to the manufacturer to engage in or even to continue his business? What hope is there for the future welfare of American labor in free trade? And while we are all proud of our land, which is admitted to be the best in the world, which was built up under and had its greatest prosperity under a protective policy, I am led to the inquiry, Are we legislating for our Republic?

Recently a large factory moved from my home city, for a goodly consideration, to another town. We all disliked to see it go, Democrats and Republicans alike, and I am sure that the townsfolk where it relocated all rejoiced at its arrival, Democrats and Republicans, because of the employment it would furnish; and what is true of a city inures correspondingly to a State or nation. When there is no employment of labor there is universal distress, and so important is the duty on imports that twice Congress has been called in extra session to adopt a protective-tariff measure, and it must be admitted that the McKinley bill and the Dingley bill gave to this country two periods of its greatest prosperity, and under the present law provision is made for a tariff board to determine the fair duty that should be paid upon imported articles. This board is especially equipped for this office. The present bill is a wandering free-trade orphan, upon which there has not been a hearing, and which does not even contain the tariff-for-revenue principle.

The American farmer is a protectionist; and when you admit meat free, flour free, and farm products free you strike a blow at his industry. The American laborer is a protectionist, and when you admit articles manufactured by foreign pauper labor in direct competition with his skill and industry you strike a blow at him.

Much has been said about the efficiency of the foreign laborer. I hope that the American laborer will not be obliged to do more than a fair day's work, and that for this he will receive his full share of the profits. I have worked side by side with the foreign laborer, I have employed them, and will say that they do a satisfactory day's work and get twice as much pay for it in this country as they received in foreign countries. It seems to me that if ever a proposition was proven or established (and I understand that our Democratic friends now concede it), it is the fact that wages are much higher in America than in any other country on the globe—nearly double that in any other country and five times that paid in some. How does that sound my American workmen friends?

Name some countries you would rather work in, where you would be paid more or treated better or have more golden opportunities, than America. In my early life I, as no doubt others of you, was a laboring man and as a sample of what opportunity awaits the youth of this glorious Republic you are entitled to the inspiration if any. Wealth, position, and honor are the rewards of true merit open to rich and poor alike. I for one will not strike a blow at my country's welfare or close an avenue to a worthy young man or increase the burden of the laborer.

The Republican Party recognizes the special needs of wage-workers generally, for their well-being means the well-being of all; and whatever comfort can be found in encouraging foreign manufacture or giving employment to foreign pauper labor, the Democratic Party is entitled to and can have all the credit.

The importer gets the benefit. The farmers' free list, the bill is called. Why, the farmer does not buy his plow, drag, reaper, thrashing machine, wire, meat, or biscuit of the foreign manufacturer. The best agricultural implements, the best thrashers, and the best fencing wire is made in America; the best crops produced; the best and happiest workmen, the finest schools and churches and homes, children, climate, soil, scenery are all in America. How we do love to boast of America and its grandeur and prosperity; how we do love to boast of our country and its flag. More men have fought for it—more men have died for it—than for any other flag. Oh, how the foreigners do love to get under its protective folds, and its protecting stars and stripes.

Let us be fair. Do my Democratic friends forget that there is now an act and provision of law which says to the world that plows, tooth and disk harrows, harvesters, reapers, agricultural drills and planters, mowers, horserakes, cultivators, thrashing machines, and cotton gins may be imported free of duty, provided that any of the foregoing are imported from any country, dependency, province, or colony which imposes no tax or duty on like articles imported from the United States?

Can anything be fairer than that? Is that not the golden rule? Would you find fault with the ten commandments? By this law we admit every implement of agriculture into this country free providing the country sending them will admit our manufactures on a like basis. But this is not enough. You now present this bill, which in effect allows every foreign country on earth to import the articles mentioned—implements and farm products—free into this country, while we are charged a duty of from 15 to 30 per cent when we export American-made products—articles made by the hand of the American laborer—into their country. This is certainly free trade backward. Is this called high statesmanship? These imported manufactured articles should be manufactured by American workmen. These foreign farm products should be raised by the American farmer. Now, the American farmer buys his implements of the American manufacturer and in turn the American manufacturer buys his products of the American farmer. The American manufacturer furnishes work to the American working man, who in turn buys the products of the American farm, and by working together all are benefited.

The prosperity of our country rests upon the prosperity of agriculture and our farmer can not prosper if his product is supplanted by foreign meats, flour, and similar articles.

RECIPROCITY.

A few days ago an act for reciprocal-trade relations with our sister country, Canada, was passed by this body. Practically all the Democrats voted for it, supposedly because of its free-trade principles.

This treaty is favored by Canada for the purpose of giving our American market of 90,000,000 people to Canada free for her farm products. And in this connection, in support of that proposition, I here quote a part of an interview with Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the prime minister of Canada, in the Columbian Magazine, May number, who favors its adoption for that reason.

This is what he said:

We are, above all, an agricultural people; our chief wealth is the growth of those products of the temperate zone, fruits, cereals, and vegetables; and it is our boast—but a boast founded on actual experience—that in cereals, vegetables, and fruits we can, without exaggeration, beat the world. * * * Our object to-day is to open the door of the American market, to open the door of a Nation of 90,000,000, which has been closed to us for the last 50 years. * * *

Although it was part of our policy to obtain reciprocity with the United States, we have acted carefully in so doing and have not injured any industry. The only industry affected is that of agricultural implements, on some of which the duty has been reduced from 17½ per cent to 15 per cent and on others from 20 per cent to 15 per cent. It would have been pleasing, for myself at all events, to go beyond that, but we considered that if we did we would perhaps not do justice to the large body which has invested money in these establishments. The Government does not exist for the farmers alone or the manufacturers alone, or for any one class, but for the manufacturers and the farmers and for the classes which compose our nation.

Thus it is seen that the Canadian prime minister wants the American market for the Canadian farm products.

But it is said that we may need Canada in the future. If so, let us wait until that time comes. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." We do not need it now.

It is conceded that the high cost of living—which won the recent election for the Democrats and the reduction of which is given as the reason for this treaty—can not be laid to the door of the American farmer. He sold and is now selling his products slightly above cost in the market which he helped to build up.

A glance at the prices which the farmer is receiving at the present time for his products may be of interest to those who are abusing him for the high cost of living. I will insert in my remarks a weekly market report from the Charlotte (Mich.) Republican of May 4, 1911:

No article is named by any Member of this House, Democratic or Republican, for which the farmer is paid too much; and to protect his interest the American farmer has, by a protest that echoes throughout the Republic, expressed his disapproval of this treaty. In like manner are his interests coupled with those of the laboring man and the manufacturer, which are being assailed by this bill. And on its passage will descend the darkness of despair now appearing on the industrial horizon of our country, brought on by threats and calamity talk, to envelop and work disaster to American labor, agriculture, and manufacture. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. McCOY].

Mr. McCOY. Mr. Chairman, I have observed that the new Members who speak here for the first time in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union seem to find it necessary to enter some sort of a disclaimer, and I will now enter mine, in about this way: In talking with a colleague from Georgia, also a new Member, the other day, he said to me that he thought he had reached a wise conclusion, namely, not to say anything at this session of Congress, because, as he stated, he believed that the old Democratic Members here, who had fought Democratic battles on this floor for so many years, ought now to have full swing, when we have the majority. On the other hand, one of my colleagues from New Jersey was good enough to say that he could see no harm in my talking upon this measure. So, between the upper millstone of modesty imposed by the remarks of the gentleman from Georgia and the nether millstone of encouragement received from my friend from New Jersey, I shall endeavor to grind out some sort of a grist, which I hope at the worst will not do any damage to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. [Laughter and applause.]

I have not heard all the speeches that have been made on this pending bill, nor have I had time to read all the speeches, and in both these respects I think that I may say that I am in very good company here in the city of Washington; but so far as I have been able to listen and so far as I have had time to read the speeches that have been made it has seemed to me that they have dealt principally with details and not largely with general principles, and I should like to make a few suggestions at this time, not involving details—and of course not saying anything very original about the tariff; for he would be a wise man indeed who could say anything original about the tariff—which, in my opinion, if properly considered, can not fail to aid in the correct solution of the tariff problem which is now under consideration.

DOES TAXATION CREATE WEALTH?

If a protective tariff accomplishes what its advocates claim for it, namely, the giving of protection to American producers, that result can be accomplished only by making it possible for our producers to charge higher prices than they otherwise would, and that they do charge higher prices because of the tariff is no longer disputed. A great many people call these higher prices a tribute levied by producers on the consumers, but let us call it a tax.

That customs duties levied on imports are a tax is one of the few obviously sound propositions that have not been denied by protectionists.

A protective tariff law results, then, in nothing but the imposition of two taxes. The protectionists' claim for such a law is that it produces wealth and leads to prosperity, consequently the general proposition involved is that taxation produces wealth and leads to prosperity. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I have admired the altruistic spirit prevailing in this body, leading Members on each side to give advice to those on the other, and animated, I hope, by that spirit, I suggest to any Member on the other side who seeks reelection in 1912, that when he makes his opening speech of the campaign, he shall state to his constituents that he bases his expectation of election on his success in maintaining the truth of the proposition that taxation creates wealth. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

PROTECTION DOES NOT RAISE WAGES.

Perhaps the one argument that more than any other has deluded voters in this country into putting the Republican Party in power is the claim that a protective tariff increases wages. I imagine that one cause of the result is that in discussing the question, it is dealt with on the basis of billions of dollars, millions of workmen, hundreds of thousands of industrial plants, and thousands of industries. Such large figures are confusing to all of us and especially to the men whose daily toil leaves them with little leisure and no strength for a careful consideration of the question.

The validity of the claim can be tested by what I may call the rule of three, which reduces it to a basis of simplicity. Lest I should mar the rule by stating it in my own language, let me read it in the words of a master of clear exposition, who says:

We will, however, pursue the protectionist doctrine of wages a little further. It is totally false that protective taxes raise wages. As I will show further on, protective taxes lower wages. Now, however, I am assuming the protectionist's own premises and doctrines all the time. He says that his system raises wages. Let us go to see some of the wages-class and get some evidence on this point. We will take three wageworkers, a boot man, a hat man, and a cloth man. First, we ask the boot man, "Do you win anything by this tariff?" "Yes," he says, "I understand that I do." "How?" "Well, the way they explain it to me is that when anybody wants boots he goes to my boss, pays him more on account of the tax, and my boss gives me part of it." "All right. Then your comrades here, the hat man and the cloth man, pay this tax in which you share?" "Yes; I suppose so. I never thought of that before. I supposed that rich people paid the taxes, but I suppose that when they buy boots they must do it, too." "And when you want a hat you go and pay the tax on hats, part of which (as you explain the system) goes to your friend the hat man; and when you want cloth you pay the tax which goes to benefit your friend the cloth man?" "I suppose that it must be so." We go then to see the hat man and have the same conversation with him, and we go to see the cloth man and have the same conversation with him. Each of them then gets two taxes and pays two taxes. Three men illustrate the whole case. If we should take a thousand men in a thousand industries, we should find that each paid 999 taxes and each got 999 taxes, if the system worked as it is said to work. What is the upshot of the whole? Either they all come out even on their taxes paid and received or some of the wage receivers are winning something out of other wage receivers to the net detriment of the whole class. If each man is creditor for 999 taxes and each debtor for 999 taxes, and if the system is "universal and equal," we can save trouble by each drawing 999 orders on the creditors to pay to themselves their own taxes, and we can set up a clearing house to wipe off all the accounts. Then we come down to this as the net result of the system when it is "universal and equal," that each man as a consumer pays taxes to himself as a producer. That is what is to make us all rich. We can accomplish it just as well and far more easily, when we get up in the morning, by transferring our cash from one pocket to the other.

One point, however, and the most important of all, remains to be noticed. How about the thousandth tax? How is it when the boot man wants boots and the hat man hats and the cloth man cloth? He has to go to the store on the street and buy of his own boss, at the market price (tax on), the very things which he made himself in the shop. He then pays the tax to his own employer, and the employer, according to the doctrine, "shares" it with him. Where is the offset to that part which the employer keeps? There is none. The wages class, even on the protectionist explanation, may give or take from each other, but to their own employers they give and take not. At election time the boss calls them in and tells them that they must vote for protection or he must shut up the shop, and that they ought to vote for protection, because it makes their wages high. If, then, they believe in the system, just as it is taught to them, they must believe that it causes him to pay them big wages, out of which they pay back to him big taxes, out of which he pays them a fraction back again, and that but for this arrangement the business could not go on at all. A little reflection shows that this just brings up the question for a wage earner: How much can I afford to pay my boss for hiring me? Or, again, which is just the same thing in other words: What is the net reduction of my wages below the market rate under freedom which results from this system?

Before leaving the question of wages I should like to read what the same writer says about "pauper labor." It is as follows:

"Pauper labor" had a meaning in the first half of this (the nineteenth) century in England, when the overseers of the poor turned over the younger portion of the occupants of the poorhouses to the owners of the new cotton factories, under contracts to teach them the trade and pay them a pittance. Of course the arrangement had shocking evils connected with it, but it was a transition arrangement. The "pauper laborers'" children, after a generation, became independent laborers; the system expired of itself, and "pauper laborer" is now a senseless jingle.

President Hoffstot, of the Pressed Steel Car Co., during the strike at his plant in 1909, speaking of wages, said:

When all is said and done, it's supply and demand that fix wages. The 1907 rates have nothing to do with what we pay men to-day. We buy labor in the cheapest market.

This is a frank and accurate statement by a protected manufacturer, and, I may add, a brutal one under the circumstances.

The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] told us yesterday of the small earnings of a cabman in Oxford, England, and his statements will be sent broadcast some day. I regret that I did not have with me when he was talking some figures which I am about to read, for I should have liked to ask him whether he had ever heard of similar figures in this country, and in that way some of the horrible conditions here could be shown in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD alongside of his cabman's wages.

The facts which I am about to state were learned in New York City by an investigator vouched for by the New York Child Labor Commission, and were not gathered for political purposes.

What does the gentleman from Connecticut think of these figures?

Children's white dresses are paid for at the rate of 50 cents a dozen, and the average daily output is one dozen a day, and the average working day is 13 hours.

Violets are made for 3½ cents a gross, and a mother and three girls and the grandmother earn at this work 60 cents a day.

Piecing out good feathers with strands from bad feathers, called "willowing," is paid for at the rate of 4 to 6 cents an inch. An 18-inch feather can be made in one and one-half days, and the maker gets from 72 cents to $1.08.

The average wage of an entire family at garment finishing is from 60 to 70 cents a day.

Making cigarette wrappers brings 10 cents a thousand, and a woman working from 6 a. m. to 12 p. m. can make $2 a week.

These wrappers are made for a merchant on a fashionable street, and stamped as made in Egypt, Turkey, or elsewhere, and you can have your initials on them in silver, blue, or gold, if you wish.

The housing conditions of most of the people in these employments are of the worst.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an inquiry at this point?

Mr. McCOY. Certainly.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. I would like to know in what year these figures were taken in order to ascertain if it was during a time of so-called Republican prosperity.

Mr. McCOY. They were taken in 1910. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Thank you very much. It is as I expected.

Mr. McCOY. Now, whether the gentleman from Connecticut would call this labor "pauper labor" or not I do not know, but I do say that the manufacturers in this country who are employing this kind of labor—and I can cite a great many other cases of the same kind—ought to be thoroughly ashamed of themselves, and there ought to be some law, if the protective taxes are to be continued on the statute books, which would compel these men to give to these poor women and children the full benefit of all they get from the tariff. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

PROTECTION IS MONGREL SOCIALISM.

Now, I wonder how many of our Republican friends ever stop to think that protectionism is nothing but mongrel socialism—socialism because it is State intervention with the avowed purpose of warding off the necessity for open competition; mongrel because the State permits one man to put his hand into another man's pocket on the promise of a fair distribution of what he is able to take away from him—and he is able generally to take a plenty—instead of itself taking and distributing. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I should be interested to hear the only Member of this House elected by the Socialist Party inquire of our Republican friends why they are unwilling to carry protectionism to its logical socialistic conclusion.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will yield the gentleman five minutes additional.

A SCIENTIFIC PROTECTIVE TARIFF IS SCIENTIFIC GREED.

Mr. McCOY. The Republican national platform of 1908 announced that—

In all tariff legislation the true principle of protection is best maintained by the imposition of such duties as will equal the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad, together with a reasonable profit to American manufacturers.

This dogma has come to be hailed as a statement of a "scientific" method of framing a tariff. It is obvious that a tariff law of the kind described would absolutely shut off foreign competition, and if applied would result in our paying enormously more for many things than we do even now. Mr. Aldrich was willing to apply the dogma to the utmost limit, for he said in the Hall at the other end of this building while the Payne-Aldrich-Smoot bill was being debated that in order to equalize conditions he would vote for a duty of 300 per cent as willingly as for a duty of 50 per cent.

It has been stated that the doctrine was first definitely formulated in the Republican platform of 1908, but it had been thought of as early as when Mr. Blaine wrote Twenty Years of Congress. Mr. Blaine said:

An adjustment of the protective duty to the point which represents the average difference between wages of the labor in Europe and in America will, in the judgment of protectionists, always prove impracticable. The difference can not be regulated by a scale of averages, because it is constantly subject to arbitrary changes. If the duty be adjusted on that basis for any given date, a reduction of wages would at once be forced abroad, and the American manufacturers would, in consequence, be driven to the desperate choice of surrendering the home market or reducing the pay of workmen. The theory of protection is not answered, nor can its realization be attained by any such device. Protection, in the perfection of its design, as described by Mr. Hamilton, does not invite competition from abroad, but is based on the controlling principle that competition at home will always prevent monopoly on the part of the capitalist, assure good wages to the laborer, and defend the consumer against the evil of distortion.

Mr. Blaine was right in his statement that protection is designed to shut out competition. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Let us not deceive ourselves into believing that the protected interests will ever be satisfied with anything less.

If I understood rightly what the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] said yesterday, he criticized the majority of the present Ways and Means Committee for making use of the evidence, so-called, given at the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee which framed the Payne bill, claiming, as I understood it, that the Democrats tacitly admitted the usefulness of that evidence by not having further hearings at this time. The trouble with the Payne Ways and Means Committee was that it failed to make proper use of information which was furnished it by various manufacturers. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I will cite one instance.

Last summer I asked a friend of mine, who is one of the largest manufacturers of Portland cement in this country, what advantage to cement manufacturers there was in the duty of 30 cents a barrel, and he replied that there was no advantage, adding that cement is sold in this country at as low a price as it can be delivered by English and German manufacturers f. o. b. at their factories. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I then asked him what the tariff had done to aid the building up of the cement industry to its present enormous proportions. Again he replied that it had done nothing. I asked him to what that development was due, and he informed me that one of those engaged in the business observed some years ago the operations of a rotary roaster being used at a mine in the West and was shrewd enough to see that this machine could be used in the cement business. Formerly the baking process was carried on by the use of kilns; a layer of fuel was first placed, then a layer of cement bricks, then another layer of fuel, and so on. The fire was then started and the bricks were roasted by this method. Now the roasting is done in the rotary machine, and a process which once took days now takes a few hours only. I then inquired of my friend why the duty of 30 cents a barrel was allowed to remain as one of the provisions of the tariff bill, and he stated that in his opinion it was because manufacturers in other industries who were getting the benefits of protective duties were unwilling to have the nominal duty removed, for fear that the removal of it would be an object-lesson to consumers in this country, leading to inquiries on their part for the purpose of ascertaining whether other great industries could not be as well maintained without the alleged benefit of a tariff tax. He said that the manufacturers had told the Republican tariff framers that they preferred not to have any duty on cement. It is unnecessary to say that my friend is a Democrat [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield the gentleman five minutes additional.

Mr. McCOY. I think that the facts just stated show how much sincerity there is in the claim of the Republican Party that it believes that a duty should be imposed sufficient merely to equal the alleged difference in the cost of production here and abroad.

Now, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] has spoken of the testimony that was taken in the framing of the Payne bill, and has, I say, criticized us on this side, claiming that we tacitly admit that this testimony is good and usable testimony. Let me quote something that was said by the late Senator Dolliver, a Republican and a great man whose loss we all deplore. He said in a speech that he made at the other end of this building in June, 1910, as follows:

> Do you suppose that if last summer we had known that the total cost of smelting a ton of lead ore was $8 we would have been induced to put a duty of $42.50 a ton on pig lead, on the theory that labor was to be protected and a reasonable reward offered to capital? Do you suppose that if we had known that the cost of smelting copper in the United States is not materially greater than in other countries, we would have allowed a protective duty of $42.50 a ton on pig copper in all its forms? Do you suppose that if we had known that the rubber industry in the United States needs little or no protection, that at 30 per cent ad valorem every department of it was prosperous, that we were making rubber wearing apparel cheaper than it was made anywhere else in the world, that we were making rubber tires for automobiles with such profit that in Akron, Ohio, in 10 years the Diamond Rubber Co. had declared stock dividends which had increased its capital from $50,000 to $10,000,000 under the old rate—if we had known that, do you suppose the Senate would have listened with patience to the Senator from Rhode Island when, after admitting that rubber wearing apparel like boots and shoes needed no protection, he said "but there are rubber tires of automobiles?"

Does the gentleman from Connecticut think that we tacitly accept the testimony on which those fraudulent rates were based?

Now, as to the Republican methods of taking testimony and framing Republican tariff bills, listen to this, also from Mr. Dolliver:

> Not only are the attempts of lawmakers to write tariffs embarrassed by a community of interests, but in the same sense the whole field of legislation finds itself dealing in these latter years with allied syndicates, apparently unrelated, yet closely joined together for the purpose of usurping the authority of every department of our Government. The history of their brutal and sordid control of a great political party in the execution of its pledges to rewrite the tariff law on a rational basis laid down in its platform and approved by its candidate has turned out to be a mere forerunner of an organized attempt, only partly successful, to use the political departments of the Government, not even sparing our highest office, as mere playthings to be moved about by unseen hands, grown at length so bold that they venture, in the mere pride of strength, to forget their cunning.

Mr. Wickersham, the present Attorney General of the United States, says that the scenes surrounding the enactment of a Republican tariff law exhibit—> a purely selfish scramble for Government aid, furthered by every form of misrepresentation and misinformation.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, personally, as a Democrat, I am perfectly willing to go along with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCALL], whom we all so greatly admire, and will quote what he said on the floor of this House within the past four weeks as a preliminary to a prophecy. He said:

> Suppose there is a nation that has coal mines, iron mines, water powers, great facilities for manufacturing, and a poor soil. Is it wise for her to take her people from the operation of the great natural resources and facilities for manufacturing with which she has been blessed and put them to the cultivation of an infertile soil? Is it not better for them to work the mines, to build up manufactures, and exchange their products with some other nation that does not have these resources, but has a fertile soil?

We have coal mines, iron mines, water powers, great facilities for manufacturing, and a wonderfully fertile soil, so nothing but stupid, greedy tariff legislation can stand in the way of our utilizing these resources to their utmost limit for the lasting benefit of all and not of the few alone.

Prophecy is a very easy art, so easy that I notice that a great deal of it is practiced upon the floor of this House on the other side of the center aisle. Now, I want to indulge in just this much prophecy. I say that if for the next five years we have a Democratic tariff and, coincidentally, five of the enormous agricultural crops such as this country frequently knows, the Democratic Party will be successful not alone in 1912, but so great will be the benefit to follow from such a tariff that we can not be sent from power in 20 years. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

And in conclusion I will just add a few words more, uttered by the late Mr. Justice Miller of the Supreme Court, in an opinion delivered by him while sitting in that court. Of course he was not talking about a protective tariff, because, unfortunately, no method has yet been devised by which we can bring the validity of a protective tariff to the test of a Supreme Court decision.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired.

Mr. McCOY. I should like just one-half minute more.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield the gentleman one minute.

Mr. McCOY. Mr. Justice Miller said this in the opinion, and it accurately describes and characterizes a protective tariff:

> To lay, with one hand, the power of the Government on the property of the citizen, and with the other to bestow it upon favored individuals, to aid private enterprises and build up private fortunes, is none the less a robbery, because it is done under the forms of law and is called taxation.

[Loud applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McHENRY].

Mr. McHENRY. Mr. Chairman, so many of my Pennsylvania colleagues, following their leader, Mr. DALZELL, have pleaded the cause of the trusts and protected interests in opposition to this bill, I rise to speak in behalf of the farmers and workingmen of the country in support of the measure. [Applause.]

The question now under discussion is one of vast importance to the entire American people.

This debate has been running practically without limit and without interruption for a period of 10 days.

Whatever the result of our deliberations may be, Mr. Chairman, the American people have reason to congratulate themselves once more in securing through their Representatives a free voice in this Congress and of the full restoration, in keeping with our campaign promises, of this branch of Congress to a constructive, a deliberative, and a legislative body, as originally provided by the Constitution of the United States.

The arguments for and against the measure have been ably presented. Little, if any, new argument has been advanced in opposition.

The subject is as old as the Government itself, and the brilliant array of facts and figures marshaled for and against the measure in this debate seems to leave but little unsaid.

The principles of political economy involved in the discussion are not new. They represent in marked contrast the basic principles underlying Democracy and Republicanism. The principle of protection is now undergoing the acid test of American judgment. The last election voiced the sentiment of the people that the tariff should be lowered. The high cost of living, which has been carried beyond the earnings of the producer and wage earner; the rapidly increasing cost of government, constantly advancing prices upon life's necessities controlled by trusts and monopolies protected by the tariff, have caused a united nonpartisan demand upon the part of both the farmers and workingmen of the country, demanding a revision of the tariff downward. [Applause.]

There is no thought so unerring in its accuracy as the public thought, and if the economic principle of protection were a satisfactory principle, working with equal fairness and bringing equal benefits to all humanity, the people would not have decided upon a change of management in their governmental affairs, as they did last November.

Their decision and direct command to the Sixty-second Congress was that we should reduce the tariff, and, so far as this branch of Congress is concerned, we shall fulfill that pledge with fidelity and with such intelligence as may be given us to perform our duty. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The time has come for this country to undergo a complete financial reorganization and an economic change to meet modern conditions. Those fundamental principles of political economy which might have applied in the earlier formation of the country are not applicable now. The principle of taxation and protection for infant industries which might have successfully applied 50 years ago to a population of 50,000,000 people and an area of 3,000,000 square miles can not be expected to apply with equal success and equal fairness to a population of 91,000,000 people within the same fixed territory.

We have heard much argument about this school and that school of tariff, about this fundamental principle and that fundamental principle, but the only school we recognize or the only principle we shall adhere to will be that principle which works for the good of the great mass of the people of the United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Capital has a right to be considered in equal fairness with labor, but capital needs no additional protection. It certainly needs no special privilege against labor, and it is that special privilege which we, in an honest effort and with absolute fairness, shall try to remove.

The wage earners and the farmers do not ask for special privilege, nor do they ask for special protection. But of all classes of humanity, the men and women who need protection most, if any need protection, are those men and women who are thrown into this maelstrom of life with nothing but their hands and brains with which to earn a livelihood. [Applause on the Democratic side.] These people who constitute the bone and sinew of our country, the very bulwark of the Nation, the men who dig our coal and build our railroads and bridges, who work in the shop or behind the counter, who delve into the earth for iron ore and precious metals, the farmer who tills the soil to feed the world, the women who bear their part in rearing families or who, perchance, must enter into competition with men to earn a livelihood, these are the ones in whose behalf we should legislate. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Every law enacted by the National Congress is simply an agreement by and between all American citizens. In all legislation there are unavoidably some interests more directly affected than others. In this particular measure we find four interests directly affected:

(1) The Government.
(2) The farmer.
(3) The wage earner.
(4) The manufacturer.

THE GOVERNMENT.

In all legislation it is our sworn duty to serve the best interests of the Government.

The Government is best served when the interests of all the people have been best served. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The Democratic theory of government is the least amount of government with the smallest tax rate consistent with an economic and progressive public policy.

The Republican theory of taxation is not how little we can get along with, but for how much will the people and the commercial interests stand. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

In order that we may thoroughly understand the wide scope of the measure and the benefits which will accrue to the consumer by removing the tariff tax from the articles enumerated, I ask permission to insert a copy of the bill in my remarks. This bill places upon the free list the following articles:

Plows, tooth and disk harrows, headers, harvesters, reapers, agricultural drills and planters, mowers, horserakes, cultivators, threshing machines and cotton gins, farm wagons and farm carts, and all other agricultural implements of any kind and description, whether specifically mentioned herein or not, whether in whole or in parts, including repair parts.

Bagging for cotton, gunny cloth, and all similar fabrics, materials, or coverings, suitable for covering and baling cotton, composed in whole or in part of jute, jute butts, hemp, flax, seg, Russian seg, New Zealand tow, Norwegian tow, aloe, mill waste, cotton tares, or any other materials or fibers suitable for covering cotton; and burlaps and bags or sacks composed wholly or in part of jute or burlaps or other material suitable for bagging or sacking agricultural products.

Hoop or band iron, or hoop or band steel, cut to lengths, punched or not punched, or wholly or partly manufactured into hoops or ties, coated or not coated with paint or any other preparation, with or without buckles or fastenings, for baling cotton or any other commodity; and wire for baling hay, straw, and other agricultural products.

Grain, buff, split, rough and sole leather, band, bend, or belting leather, boots and shoes made wholly or in chief value of leather made from cattle hides and cattle skins of whatever weight, of cattle of the bovine species, including calfskins; and harness, saddles, and saddlery, in sets or in parts, finished or unfinished, composed wholly or in chief value of leather; and leather cut into shoe uppers or vamps or other forms suitable for conversion into manufactured articles.

Barbed fence wire, wire rods, wire strands or wire rope, wire woven or manufactured for wire fencing, and other kinds of wire suitable for fencing, including wire staples.

Beef, veal, mutton, lamb, pork, and meats of all kinds, fresh, salted, pickled, dried, smoked, dressed or undressed, prepared or preserved in any manner; bacon, hams, shoulders, lard, lard compounds and lard substitutes; and sausage and sausage meats.

Buckwheat flour, corn meal, wheat flour and semolina, rye flour, bran, middlings, and other offals of grain, oatmeal and rolled oats, and all prepared cereal foods; and biscuits, bread, wafers, and similar articles not sweetened.

Timber, hewn, sided, or squared, round timber used for spars or in building wharves, shingles, laths, fencing posts, sawed boards, planks, deals, and other lumber, rough or dressed, except boards, planks, deals, and other lumber, of lignum-vitæ, lancewood, ebony, box, granadilla, mahogany, rosewood, satinwood, and all other cabinet woods.

Sewing machines, and all parts thereof.

Salt, whether in bulk or in bags, sacks, barrels, or other packages.

This bill, Mr. Chairman, is either a good or bad bill. It either should or should not become a law. If we can show, first, that the Government does not need the money collected from these articles, if we can show that it is of benefit to the farmer and to the wage earner and that it is not unfair to the honest manufacturer who seeks no special advantage over his fellows—and none other has a right to our consideration—then we have proven our case, against which no reasonable argument, except the argument of the protected interests of the country, can be of avail.

THE NATIONAL TREASURY LOSES $10,000,000, WHILE THE PEOPLE GAIN $300,000,000.

It is estimated, Mr. Chairman, that the Government Treasury will lose $10,000,000 in import duties, caused by the enactment of this bill. It is also estimated, in accordance with a statement prepared for the New York World, which I give herewith, that while the Government Treasury loses $10,000,000 there is a saving to the American people of over $300,000,000:

THE FARMERS' FREE LIST—MEANS A SAVING TO CONSUMERS OF $300,000,000 A YEAR.

[Washington dispatch to New York World.]

It is expected that the farmers' free-list bill will save consumers more than $300,000,000 annually. The consumption, measured by the net supply, in values, of the articles on the free list runs as follows:

Salt, $9,540,824.
Agricultural implements, $90,637,110.
Bagging for cotton, sacks, burlaps, etc., $26,031,644.
Cotton ties, hoop or band iron, $12,639,953.
Leather, boots and shoes, harness, and saddles, $493,005,263.
Barbed and other fence wire, wire rods, etc., $113,027,205.
Fresh and preserved meats, $614,895,219.
Flour and grits, cereals and bread, $665,041,533.
Lumber, laths, and shingles, $699,599,293.
Sewing machines, and parts thereof, $8,497,460.

If the free-list bill becomes a law and prices settle down in time, as some of the advocates of the same believe they will, the consumers may save the following sums:

On salt, $4,862,005.
Agricultural implements, $13,876,541.
Bagging, sacks, etc., $6,992,099.
Cotton ties, $2,017,336.
Leather, boots and shoes, etc., $37,483,788.
Barbed wire, etc., $32,861,066.
Fresh and preserved meats, $133,493,752.
Flour, grits, etc., $18,355,146.
Lumber, laths, etc., $59,955,659.
Sewing machines, $2,549,239.

After all, Mr. Chairman, the National Treasury is simply the people's treasury; and we propose to enact a bill that, while it causes a loss of $1 from the national pocket, it puts $30 back into the people's pockets, where it rightfully belongs, instead of into the pockets of a trust. [Applause on the Democratic side.] But we are asked, How shall the Government make up this shortage? The demands of our Government are already greater than our income.

Mr. Chairman, that is one of the reasons why this new Congress has been elected by the people. The people are not satisfied that the past management of the Government has been economical. One of the contributory causes for a high protective tariff has been the enormous expenditures of the Government. So great have become the extravagant expenditures that the levying of a tariff tax merely for purposes of revenue, to meet the demands of the Government, has become of itself an incidental protective tariff tax. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

In our effort to reduce the burden of taxation upon the people it may be necessary for us to bring about some degree of reduction of governmental expenditures. For instance, if necessary, we can get along very well with one battleship per year less. If necessary, we can cut down the standing Army. Prior to the Spanish-American War we maintained a standing Army of 25,000 men. We now have about 90,000 men in the Army, and it costs about a thousand dollars annually per man to maintain the Army. Our Army expenditures alone runs about $100,000,000 annually. I am in favor of reducing our standing Army to 35,000 men—where it was before the Spanish-American War—with the addition of 10,000 men for coast defense. This is a matter to be taken up at another time. I only refer to it now as one of many ways for the reduction of governmental expenditures.

The Democratic Congress has already started the initiative in absolutely good faith to the country by reducing its own expenditures, by laying off USELESS employees that for years have been carried on the Government pay roll, some of whom were not even doing service here in Washington. Our first attempt toward economy in this direction will be over $200,000 per year.

This is just the beginning, and I now want to ask the farmers, wage earners, professional and business men of the country, Which would you rather have, this increased $10,000,000 in the Treasury and the increased tax to the American consumer of $300,000,000 per year following this tariff tax, or that tax removed and, if necessary, get along with one battleship less per year?

We are willing and ready to meet every exigency of the Government, and willing to levy every tax sufficient to meet the normal expenses of the Government, but we shall cut down these expenditures, lower the necessity for high protection, and remove the tax from the necessaries of life wherever possible. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The passage of the reciprocity measure was the first opportunity offered us in a step toward the lowering of the tariff. In that measure we could not get all we should like to have had, but we had to take the proposition as offered us and as agreed upon by and between the commissioners of the two countries.

This free-list bill now follows as a companion measure, and is an honest effort upon our part to endeavor to equalize and distribute the benefits through all classes of American producers and American consumers. So, as far as the Government is concerned, this measure, which is for the advancement of comfort and thrift of the great mass of the American people, is a measure which will serve the best interests of the Government, and should become a law with the least possible delay.

Every measure which tends to reduce the burden of taxation to the lowest possible limit consistent with efficiency of service is in keeping with the Democratic idea of the science of modern government.

A satisfied and contented people constitute the very bulwark of every government.

The people know that there has been unfair legislation in behalf of special interests. They know that their burdens have been increased. They ask and demand relief from the extortion of trusts and monopolies, and always, be it remembered, a sovereign people like this will get what they want either one way or another. This issue of a reduction of the tariff tax and of a return to a sound governmental economy is absolutely essential for the welfare of our future Republic. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

THE FARMER.

Mr. Chairman, what means this suddenly aroused interest in behalf of the American farmer upon the part of such great protection advocates as Mr. DALZELL, Mr. CANNON, Mr. FORDNEY, Mr. MANN, and other Republican leaders?

For years the American farmers and wage earners have been knocking at the doors of Congress asking only for equal rights and equal privileges under the law. In all these years of full Republican control in every branch of the National Government the pleas of the people have been denied and legislation in behalf of the special interests of the country have gone on and on unchecked. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

It is said that history repeats itself, and, sir, history is about to repeat itself in this and future Congresses. The farmers and workingmen of the country, who are the producers of all wealth, are coming into their own, and from this time on will have a voice in the affairs of their National and State Governments.

With unlimited political power and backed by the uncounted millions of concentrated wealth of the financial interests of the country the Republican leaders in Congress have heretofore ignored every demand upon the part of the people for a fair deal, believing in their blind hope that under this false theory of protection and continued broken promises to American labor they might be uninterruptedly continued in office for the carrying out of the wishes of the special interests of this country whom they represent here in this Congress.

Why this touching sympathy now for the farmer upon the part of such high priests of protection as my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL]? He and his associates are perhaps more directly responsible than all others for having bound the people of this country as human chattels carrying tribute to the great Steel Trust, the Lumber Trust, the Sugar Trust, the Oil Trust, and a hundred other trusts, which control absolutely nearly every article of human wear and human consumption. [Applause.]

Is it true that at last these deposed leaders have recognized the dignity and power of the American farmer and workingman?

Why this bitter fight over Canadian reciprocity? Not because it would work any harm to the farming industry of the country, but these sagacious political leaders well knew that if once the pillar of protection were removed from the farmer, that if once his eyes are opened to the nakedness and fraud of a protective tariff as applied to his interests, that he would no longer support the measure.

The American farmer and wage earner need broader markets. Canada is rapidly becoming one of our best customers. With a population of 92,000,000 of people our surplus production is and should be greater than the surplus production of 8,000,000 of Canada's population.

We need the Canadian market much more than the Canadians need our market. Of the same blood and soil, they are our neighbors and our friends, and there is no more reason for imposing a tax on the interchange of trade between Canada and the United States than there would be between the States of New York and Pennsylvania.

A careful analysis of our trade relations with Canada shows that Canada is a good country for us to trade with. Any country which buys from us more than it sells to us is a good country for us to trade with. With such a country all artificial trade restrictions should be removed.

Let me submit some Government statistics:

During five years ending June 30:
We sold to Canada	$886,417,376
Canada sold to us	393,913,673
Difference in our favor	492,503,703
Separating some of the important items, we find:

Cattle:
We sold in Canada	1,578,179

Meat and dairy products:

Canada sold to us	904,191
Difference in our favor	16,106,826
Breadstuffs:
We sold in Canada	31,596,556
Canada sold to us	6,679,884
Difference in our favor	24,916,672
Total differences in our favor on above items	53,030,755

We were elected to Congress on our promise to reduce the tariff. An extra session of Congress has been called by the President for the consideration of the Canadian reciprocity bill. We have passed it. Why? Not because it is all we should have it to be, but because it is a step in the right direction, and the measure as agreed upon by and between the representatives of both countries could not be changed without involving years of delay and possible defeat of the measure.

Great economic reforms can not be brought about in a day or a year. A beginning must be made somewhere. Canadian reciprocity is but the beginning. Our second step is this free-list bill covering over 100 articles of direct interest to the farmer and wage earner, and schedule by schedule our work of revision will go on until a complete revision shall have reduced the tariff to a revenue basis. Levying the heavier tax on the luxuries and lightening the burden of taxation on life necessities as provided in this bill.

The same political argument is being rehearsed and advanced now as formerly. We are told that factories and mills are shutting down. We are told that the prices of grain are already getting lower. I want my Republican friends to answer me this question. The years 1906 and 1907 were the greatest years of industrial prosperity in the country, and in spite of all the evidences of accumulated wealth, in October of 1907 commenced one of the most bitter panics we have ever had and from which we have not yet recovered. In 1906, prior to the panic, and when there was not a financial ripple on the sky anywhere, the price of wheat at the farm throughout the United States was 66½ cents per bushel. If a tariff tax on farm commodities protected the farmers' market, then why these low prices in a time of great commercial activity? The answer is that the farmers' prices are fixed in the world's market and regulated by the law of supply and demand. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, I was born and reared on a farm. I live on a farm to-day, and am engaged in farming at the present time. I know something of farming conditions. I know something of the farmer's trials, of his pleasures, his disappointments, and his hopes. Each year brings an increasing desire to do what little may be in my power to advance their interests or elevate their conditions, and, sir, far be it from me, by word or act, to contribute to any cause which would work a detriment to the farmers and wage earners of this country, the splendid men and women who constitute the vital force of this great country. [Applause.]

You boast of your friendly interest in the farmer. I ask you to point out what you have done for him. Carry your memories back to the colonial period. At that time the farmers and laborers were the real owners of all the wealth of this country. The framers of the Declaration of Independence were all farmers, thus demonstrating that they had a controlling voice in their government. Compare those times with financial and political conditions as they exist to-day, when we find that now one-eighth of all our population is owning seven-eighths of the wealth of the country, and Wall Street, through its various ramifications owning and controlling the Government.

It would appear that there is something vitally wrong either with the farming as an industry or the conditions which surround the farm. What have you done to help the farmer? Has protection helped him? No. As population increased you have forced him to take up new land, and he has been driven farther and farther west until now he has come to the shores of the Pacific.

For years and years the conditions surrounding the American farmer were such that it was almost impossible for him to make ends meet and impossible for him to keep his children at home and employed upon the farm. OUR HIGH PROTECTIVE POLICIES HAVE BEEN MORE RESPONSIBLE FOR DRIVING THE BOYS AND GIRLS FROM THE FARM, SEPARATING FAMILIES, HERDING THEM IN CITIES LIKE SERFS THAN ANY AND ALL OTHER CONDITIONS COMBINED. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The Republican Party is brought to the door of justice; judgment was rendered upon you in the last election, and now when we are trying to make an honest effort to redeem the pledges and carry out the wishes of the people you, under the pretense of being a friend to the farmer and wage earner, would endeavor to array those vast interests to the defense of the special protected interests who have been robbing the people of their earnings for many years.

The farm represents the basic industry of America and of the world. We have but two great sources of productive wealth:

(1) The earth and its products.

(2) Human energy.

In our farm population we find a total of 35,000,000 of people, represented by six or seven million individual farmhouses, each one operating as a separate and isolated unit; each one forced to enter an open market with everything he has to sell in competition with all the world and to enter a closed and monopolized market in everything he has to buy.

He is ground between the upper and nether millstone. The farmers and wage earners can neither fix their own price upon that which they have to sell nor upon that which they must buy.

This legislation is directed against the special interests who have secured an unfair advantage over the balance of the American people. The farmer and the wage earner must each produce a given amount of value for every dollar they receive. That is and has been the inmutable law from the days of Adam and will continue until the days of the millennium. The farmers' and the wage earners' earning capacity is limited and fixed; their maintenance and fixed charges are permanent, while their buying capacity is circumscribed by law and is being reduced each year.

The purchasing power of the farmer's and workingman's dollar is growing less each year [applause on the Democratic side], because he always must give an equivalent of honest value of 100 cents on every dollar he produces; but under this juggling process of high finance of tariff and trust regulation, he is obliged to go into the market and exchange his sound dollar for the things which he has to buy at a fictitious value. For instance, the manufacturing cost of a reaper is, I am informed, about $55. A 20 per cent profit to the manufacturer, would make that cost $66. So giving a bushel of wheat the unit value of a dollar, it would take 66 bushels of the farmer's wheat to buy the reaper. If the number of reaper manufacturers equaled the number of farmers in the country, the reapers would be sold on a competitive basis and the farmer could buy his reaper for 66 bushels of wheat.

But we find, enabled under the patent-right laws and the protective-tariff walls, this same reaper, which he should be able to buy for $66, is fixed at a uniform price throughout the United States for all kinds of reapers at $125 each. This means that he must take 59 bushels of surplus wheat from his bin and add it to the 66 bushels of wheat in order to pay the manufacturing cost of the reaper, the additional profit which the manufacturer is entitled to, and, in addition to that, the overhead charge of the trust, and then comes the dishonest profit created by the tariff tax in the sole benefit of the manufacturer.

All this time the farmer is compelled to put 100 cents of value in the production of a bushel of wheat, as he did 50 years ago. He can not capitalize a farm which is worth $5,000 for $25,000 and charge the consumer of his product enough more money to pay him this additional charge, as the trusts are doing, nor can he form an association of 6,000,000 other farms to regulate and fix his price. His products are sold in the world's markets and are regulated by the law of supply and demand and not by the law of protection.

As a further proof of the fact that the farmer receives no benefit from a protective tariff upon his grain and other products, I give here the domestic and foreign prices of wheat, oats, cattle, and horses for the years 1905 to 1909, inclusive:

I desire to call a witness out of President Taft's Cabinet—Secretary Wilson himself—who, in a letter to the National Grange, of February 9, 1911, relative to the prices the farmer receives, uses this language:

The United States produces surplus wheat above domestic requirements. This surplus production is sold in foreign countries. The price of our exported surplus is governed by the world's requirements, being regulated by the law of supply and demand, and the price of wheat in the United States, while we are exporting, is governed by the price at which the surplus is sold, as a general proposition. Occasionally wheat corners may interfere with the law of supply and demand and temporarily affect the price.

Wheat is never cornered until it is out of the farmer's hands and in the hands of some Chicago trust king. The price he forces up on wheat does not aid the farmer—his wheat is all sold—but the effect is that the laborer who buys his bread is held up and robbed by the millionaire who corners wheat. So this tariff on wheat of 25 cents per bushel never benefits anyone except the grain gambler, who with his corner on wheat drives up the price of the poor man's bread.

All the farmer asks in this or any other kind of legislation is fair treatment. He wants to bear his share of the burden of taxation, but he does not want to bear it all.

What has the National Government done for the farmer? Has it helped him build the 2,000,000 miles of public highways in the United States? No. Has it helped him maintain his schools? No; it has not helped in that direction to the one-tenth part of what it should. When we compare the acreage production of America with the acreage production of foreign countries with a climate and soil less favorable than ours it is quite apparent that the Agricultural Bureau of the United States is run more as a political sop to the farmer than as a matter of real and direct benefit.

I do not mean by this to criticize our able Secretary or the Agricultural Department. They have accomplished great and good work, considering the limitations placed upon them by Congress. But that Congress, under Republican management, has been occupied more with trust legislation than with farm and labor legislation can be determined by a comparison of the stability and constant advancement of trust values with the widely fluctuating farm values.

When we consider the highly developed intelligence and industry of the American farmer, the fertility of our soil, and the most favorable agricultural climate in the world, and compare our acreage production with the acreage production of other countries, it is easily apparent that we have not, as a Nation, awakened to the possibilities of our soil, nor is our Government rendering the assistance to our farm industry which it should, as can be plainly seen by the following figures which I shall give:

Average yield (in bushels per acre), 1899–1908.	United States.	Germany.	Austria.	Hungary.	France.	United Kingdom.
Oats	29.3	40.6	29.1	30.8	31.3	44.6

Potatoes	89.8	197.3	151.4	117.8	118.0	186.4

Now, observe the ever-changing prices of farm products. Were it not for the constantly increasing acreage of new lands, rich in virgin fertility, the farmers and the country would have been bankrupt long ago.

I invite a careful analysis of these official figures, and ask why protection does not help the farmer maintain his prices, as it does help the manufacturer regulate his prices.

Whether wheat sells for 65 cents per bushel or $1.25 per bushel, the farmer continues to pay a fixed or steadily increasing price for his machinery and fertilizer, but never a lower price.

Whether corn sells for 35 cents per bushel or 65 cents per bushel, the farmer continues to pay a steadily increasing price for his sugar, coffee, tobacco, and clothing.

Whether cattle sell for $15 per head or $25 per head, he continues to pay a steadily increasing price for his boots and shoes, his harness, lumber, and everything he buys.

That the farmer has reached the degree of prosperity which he has, that he has reached the power politically which he has, he owes to himself and the cooperation of his various organizations. He owes the first to the energies of himself and his family and to the divine bounty of the Creator in giving him his bounteous crops. Protection has done nothing but rob him, and he refuses to be buncoed any longer.

Mr. Chairman, I should not have the American farmer made to appear as being opposed to this bill. It is both an insult to his intelligence as a man and his integrity as a citizen. He neither needs nor wants protection. At least, he does not want any unfair advantage over any other man. Politics and panics do not concern him to the extent of driving the fear of starvation into his heart. He accepts the present and approaches the future with perfect equanimity.

The opponents of this bill tell the farmer that it would not be a good thing for him to have the tax removed from his plows, harrows, harvesters, reapers, agricultural implements of all kinds, barb fence wire, wire rods, fences, timber for his barn and house, sewing machines, and so forth. Then they tell the workingmen that it would not be a good thing for them to have cheaper meat, food, and clothing.

The farmer has been caricatured in the public press, in the theater, and in a private capacity since the days of public print. This tearful concern now upon the part of such high protectionists as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] would seem to be the crowning act of political caricature of this splendid type of American citizen and upon this great industry.

In all these years the farmer has not found any way of producing wheat except by the expenditure of a hundred cents' worth of value for every dollar he received from it. The proposition of the Republican Party for past years of rich protective policy has been that he must now take his dollar and pay a higher price for his machinery, made here in America, than the German, French, English, or Australian farmer will pay for the same machinery in foreign countries, including transportation and freight charges, as the following table of home and abroad prices of American manufactured articles will show:

[1] Per hundredweight. [2] Per long ton.

Is this what you call a fair deal to the American farmer? Is it any wonder that the farmer has rebelled against these conditions? The spirit of this bill is that the farmer who has to meet the competition of the world, selling his commodities in the world's markets and in competition with all labor in all lands that he shall be permitted to enter the world's markets to buy his materials and his supplies.

It is the belief of the Democratic Party that this Government-guaranteed profit is better in the hands and pockets of the wives and children of the farmer and wage earners than to be collected and placed in the pockets of the Reaper Trust, the Timber Trust, and like combinations of American industries. [Applause.]

In this law or agreement which we now propose we neither desire nor do we work any harm to any legitimate industry or to any honest man. WE SIMPLY DESIRE TO HAVE THE LAW OF COMPETITION WHICH CONTROLS PRODUCTION APPLY WITH EQUAL FAIRNESS TO THE LAW OF CONSUMPTION AND DISTRIBUTION.

This bill is in the interest of both the American farmer and the Government.

THE WAGE EARNER.

We now come to the question of the wage earner. In using the term I include every man and woman who must toil for daily bread, whether it is by manual labor or mental efforts, whether in the walks of a profession or those of more strenuous physical exertion. Every man who is a producer is a laborer and every man ought to be a laborer. Economic conditions will never right themselves in this country until there is a return to a proper equilibrium of an adequate proportion between the producer and the consumer.

Under our economic conditions the ratio of producers to consumers is becoming less each year. Each year adds enormously to the class of nonproducers, and at the same time a constant increase in the consumers' class. So the burden of production falls more heavily upon those to whose lot the work of production falls. There is no law or agency which can stop the accumulation or concentration of wealth. Wealth is becoming more concentrated and more powerful each year. The nearest approach to its regulation by law is to remove every element of special privilege, and when any law can be shown to give to any concern or company, trust, or corporation a special privilege or advantage, I am for the removal of that privilege absolutely regardless of what may be the temporary results. [Applause.]

This is called the farmers' free-list bill, but it is of equal importance to the wage earners of the country. The conditions confronting the wage earners of this country in the future are not entirely free from alarm. Any condition of economics or of government which changes the ratio of country to town and city life, reducing the rural population and increasing the town and city population to the extent of such a great percentage as the coming census will show, is an unhealthy, an unnatural, and an uneconomic condition. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Again, we find the Government responsible in a large degree. We have drifted away from our original moorings, and listening to the seductive plea of the dollar we have forgotten the interests of the man. The wage earner, from the standpoint of production, is in the same class as the farmer, but, unlike the farmer, he has not the help of the soil, the sun, and rain, nor has he additional capital. He is dependent alone upon his own physical and mental energies which God has given him. He can do a certain number of days' work in this life and no more.

There is no loss so great as the loss to labor of a day's work. It is the capital account of the workman. He can not replace it. Nobody can. Nature has allotted him a given number of days. He can not sell them twice. He can not issue new stock and increase his capital like the manufacturer and corporation. In times of prosperity protection gives him the little end of the increased profit. In times of depression he must bear the big end of the loss, for he must bear a double loss—the loss of his earnings and the loss of a portion of his capital in every idle day, which he can not replace.

In times of business depression and low prices the manufacturer can curtail his production or shut down his plant. His loss is loss of profits plus interest charges during his suspension, which is provided for by the prudent manager in the form of an ample reserve fund.

The farmers and wage earners can not stop. They must go on or starve. If the farmer stops, the world stops and starves. Whether times are good or bad, prices high or low, the expenses and fixed charges of the farmer and workman are just the same. Of the three, the manufacturer has a distinct advantage. He is protected by the law of the tariff and the law of monopoly, which enables him to discharge his men and curtail production and at the same time maintain the price of his manufactured article. He sells less in quantity, but seldom at a reduced price.

The situation for the farmer and workman are directly reversed. They must both sell less in quantity and at a reduced price. But of these two the farmer is the better situated. It is he who feeds the world, and before the world is fed the farmer's family must be, and is, first provided for.

But how about the workman? I have not heard much about him in this debate. If it were not for him, neither the manufacturer nor the farmer would make any profit. He is the buyer and ultimate consumer. How does he get money with which to buy? By selling his labor.

When the manufacturer can not sell, he quits and lives on his reserve or credit. When the farmer can not sell, his family is still provided with three good meals a day and a home to live in, because bread, meat, and potatoes are the things he has.

But when the workman can not sell his labor—the use of his body—he must live on his savings or beg or starve. He neither wants nor intends to do either. All he wants is an equal fighting chance, and he will maintain the independence of himself and family without asking favors of anybody, and that is what we propose to give him. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But think for a moment what it means to a workman with a family to feed and clothe and rents to pay, without work and without credit. Then, what happens to him? If you would see the results in its most pitiful form, go to the hills of Westmoreland County, in Pennsylvania, and see the evicted miners living in tents all throughout the bitter cold of a Pennsylvania winter. Think of the sufferings of a mother in childbirth under such conditions—and there have been many of them. True, this is an extreme case, but it shows the conditions of labor without employment, without a cash reserve, and without credit.

I had hoped that my colleague [Mr. DALZELL] would tell you about it, because it is in his part of the State, and we all know what a good friend of the workman Mr. DALZELL is (?). His Steel Trust so loves the laborer, and the Republican Party so loves the Steel Trust, and the laborer so loves the Republican Party that it has been a delightful family gathering at the tariff-protected election feast every two and four years. The farmers and workmen seem to have just discovered that the Carnegies always sit at the head of the table, greedily taking the best of everything, leaving nothing but the crumbs for labor, and barely that.

The workman realizes that he must accumulate a cash or property reserve fund. But how can he do this when his living costs have advanced 60 per cent while his wages have only advanced 20 per cent? This is what protection has done for American labor.

There will always be periods of prosperity and periods of depression due to unnatural and uneconomic conditions. The frequency of recurring panics and periods of business depression in America is evidence that our system of national taxation is builded upon a false principle of political economy. This has created other unnatural and uneconomic conditions of banking, currency, and credit to the extent of the centralization of interests and of financial and political power within the hands of a favored few, undreamed of by the fathers of our country.

What has protection done for the wage earner? It has thrown him open to the competition of the cheapest foreign labor in the world and at the same time compelling him to exchange the dollar which he has earned for the fictitious values, based upon watered stock values controlled by monopolies for the things he must buy. He must sell his labor as best he can. Like the farmer he can neither fix his price for that which he has to sell nor fix the price of that which he must buy. The labor organizations have helped him to some degree in fixing the price of his wage. But he finds an unnatural economic condition which, while giving him a 10 or 20 per cent increase in wages, has at the same time increased his living costs 60 per cent, and he finds at the end of the year, in spite of every possible household economy, that he has not been able to make any headway with which to meet an advancing old age.

What is this Government for? Who is it for? What would this world be if a few owned it all and nobody else were living in it? The very happiness of existence and the very elements of universal prosperity are the happiness and prosperity of these working men and women of the United States. This is a fundamental principle.

In a general way it is conceded by all. I have referred to the time when, in the Colonial period of this country, the farmers and wage earners owned all the land, and nearly every man owned his own home. Within a period of 50 years a large percentage of the wealth of the country has accumulated in the hands of a few. In no other country and under no other conditions, except under the conditions and mistaken premises of a protective tariff, could we find so many thousands of millionaires and so many hundreds of thousands of workmen who barely earn a decent living and whose plans for, and whose confidence in, the future are never free from worry.

THE LIMITATIONS OF LABOR.

The American workman can not sell a day's labor in England, another day's labor in France, Germany, and Spain, as the trust does or as the farmer sells his wheat and corn in those markets. He is confined absolutely to the home markets fixed for American labor. In addition to this the protected manufacturers say to him, "We can employ all the cheap foreign labor we want, and you must enter into competition with that labor."

Protection speaks in the Republican national platform of 1908 as follows:

> In all tariff legislation the true principle of protection is best maintained by the imposition of such duties as will equal the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad, together with a REASONABLE PROFIT TO AMERICAN INDUSTRIES.

Protection says to the manufacturer, "We shall protect you against competition and insure your profits," but it does not say to the wage earner, "We shall protect your wages and insure you plenty of employment." It has been clearly proven in this debate that, based upon the unit of production, and that is the only real wage test, the American workman is the lowest-paid workman in the world. The question of whether a wage is high or low is determined by the equivalent of value produced and the purchasing power of the wage received.

During this debate the House has been burdened with endless statistics, showing the different wage scales of the world, proving that protection does not protect the wage earner.

As I have already covered more ground and occupied more time than I had expected to do, I will sum up the argument on wages by referring to the report of the Department of Commerce and Labor, which shows that the American workman must work 225 days each year to meet living expenses, as against 220 days' work for the workman in free-trade England. I am not advocating free trade. Broader and freer trade relations with the world will come in time, but they must be brought around by a process of evolution without seriously disturbing trade conditions at home. Until we adopt the income tax—which I favor—as a method of national taxation, whereby those who have profited most by special privilege in the past shall bear their proper share of the burden of government, thus lightening the burdens for the toilers of the land—until then a tariff for revenue only is and will be a governmental necessity.

But I would not have the farmer and wage earner longer deceived that a protective tariff tax on everything they buy is the way to make them rich.

The average earnings for the worker in our manufacturing establishments is less than $474 per year. Official reports further show the average annual earnings of railway employees is $650 per year. In the laborer class we find an average daily wage of less than $1.50 per day and less than 250 days' work per year.

Further, we find the highest wages paid in nonprotected work. We find 800,000 widows employed in America. We find 400,000 children under 15 years of age employed. No, my friends, your patriotic speeches telling about the glories of the Republic and what protection has done for the people sound well, but the stubborn facts and conditions remain, confronted by the insistent demands of healthy American appetites requiring three meals a day, if they can be had.

I am glad I mentioned that. It recalls your glowing picture of the higher scale of living and your talk about the extravagance of the people as accounting for the high cost of living.

If Republican Congressmen and Senators would try living for awhile on $1.50 per day for the support of a family of five, and pay rent, I think they would never accuse the American worker, whose highest average yearly earning is less than $500, of extravagance.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] proudly mentioned the fact that American people were now consuming 6½ bushels of wheat per capita, as against 4½ bushels per capita in former years. Once in a very great while even shrewd politicians like Mr. CANNON will make a serious break and unintentionally admit a truth.

Of course the people are, as the agricultural reports show, eating more wheat and more potatoes and less meat. Why? Because their wages will not permit meat on the table every day and every meal. Such vegetarians as Rockefeller, Morgan, Carnegie, and CANNON will say that it is much better for the people to live on bread and potatoes, but it will be difficult for the Republican managers to fool the voters again with the full-dinner-pail promise. They did it once very cleverly, and then immediately after election enacted laws authorizing the Beef Trust, the Coffee and Sugar Trusts, and others to steal the good and nourishing meats and food from his dinner pail, leaving a diet of bread and potatoes for the worker and his family, who had been thus betrayed.

If you think this is overdrawn, study the agricultural reports on wheat, potatoes, meat products, and population. If you are still an unbeliever, try the scale of food and clothing on a basis of $1.50 per day, $12 per month rent, family of 5, and 22 days' work for the month, and you will find out how much sirloin steak you will use.

The argument of the standard of living for American workers is not based on facts, and the argument that his extravagance is the direct cause of high prices is as false and misleading as all the argument in favor of protection.

Each year the American manufacturer is requiring a higher percentage of production from his labor, drawing more heavily upon the vital reserve forces of the workmen, and not compensating him with his full share of the increased profits.

The case of Andrew Carnegie is a typical case of benefits of protection to a favored few and is identical with all other protected industries.

The few are permitted through this vicious method of taxation to accumulate vast fortunes, while the laborer who has produced the wealth must be content with a mere living wage when employed and starvation when not employed.

WE WANT BROADER MARKETS.

I have in my district, Mr. Chairman, the largest car-building plants in the country. Give these plants free raw material, and the splendid workmen in those shops will make cars more quickly and cheaply than any foreign competitor possibly can. With free construction material, the able management of this company can pay the highest rate of wages and sell their cars in every market in the world at a profit and give continuous employment to their men.

But under the restrictive protective policy, compelling us to trade with one another instead of offering every inducement to reach out into the markets of the world and thus create a heavier trade balance in our favor, bringing hundreds of millions of dollars of new money into the country every year, the protective policy as applied to developed industries is absolutely unsound from every economic viewpoint.

American business methods, American workmen, American machinery, and American salesmanship will meet and conquer any industrial condition in the world. The broader markets will secure for American workmen continuous employment and a correspondingly higher earning capacity. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

When times are good the American workman employed in protected industries finds when he takes his place in the mill a strange companion at his side, who can not speak the English language. The American complains, and is arrogantly informed that the company must buy its labor where it can buy it the cheapest. So the workman finds himself in competition with the cheapest pauper labor in the world.

When the mill shuts down, this cheap foreign labor migrates back to the Old World to await the return of employment here, while the American workman must continue to feed and clothe his family and pay rent.

The American workman earns his dollar in open competition, and each dollar represents a draft on his original capital—his physical energy. Now, when his wife goes to market with that dollar she finds standing upon each side of the market place the agents of the Beef Trust, the Sugar and Coffee Trusts, the Woolen Trust, the Cereal Trust, and other trusts and monopolies, who control practically everything that must be purchased and brought within a home, exacting a few pennies of protective-tariff toll from every purchase. The workman has nothing to sell but his labor.

No, Mr. Chairman, protection does not protect the farmer, nor does it protect the laborer. When it is necessary to tax the necessities of the people in order that an industry may prosper, then we are better off, from a fundamental economic standpoint, not to have that industry. In this age of modern machinery and modern methods of scientific business management an American industry which can not stand upon its own bottom without the favoritism of a special law to insure its profit, then that industry is a harm rather than a good in the commercial life of the Nation.

Even though, Mr. Chairman, I subscribe to the Democratic theory of a tariff for revenue only, I would be unwilling at this time of commercial unrest throughout the Nation to attack any industry or be a contributory part to any cause which would even temporarily throw men or women out of employment.

But in this bill which we are offering, can anyone say that the United States Steel Co. needs protection? Can anyone say that the Lumber Trust ought to have protection? Can anyone say that the food, the meat, and the cereals, and the bread of the working people ought to be taxed? Can anyone say that the implements with which the farmer tills the soil and grows the crops ought to be taxed? Can anyone claim that the great American Harvester Co. ought to be protected by a special tax?

The free raw material question was taken up at the last session of Congress, and in the hope of trying to get a lower price for shoes we did take the tariff off of hides. But it seems to have benefited only the shoe manufacturers. We are now going further, and when we find a monopoly controlling any product we are going to take the tax off the raw material and the manufactured article as well. [Applause.]

THE MANUFACTURER.

In our commercial organization the manufacturer, the railroad, the merchant each form an integral and harmonious part in the wealth production of the farm and labor.

No one would be so foolish as to desire to work a harm to any industry. But that we have outgrown the narrow policy of protection is generally admitted by all except those who are the direct beneficiaries.

One evil begets another. Protection is directly responsible for trusts and monopolies, each becoming essential to the other. By removing the one, the laws of trade will regulate the other.

No nation can become great as an agricultural nation except by and through diversified farming. No nation can become great as a manufacturing nation except by and through diversified industries. It is the small manufacturer who lends stability to trade and wages. Protection helps combinations of capital drive the small manufacturers out of business.

The American market has become the greatest and best market in the world, and so intense has become the struggle for supremacy in the home market that we are neglecting our broader and greater opportunities in a foreign market.

Capital owes something more to labor than a mere wage. It owes it the fullest and broadest opportunity for work surrounded by such conditions of trade as shall permit it to earn and save a surplus. Labor can not reach foreign markets of its own effort, but capital can and should.

For purpose of illustration, and not because of any desire to make special mention, take the United States Steel Co. Remove from it all governmental protection which now surrounds its industry. For awhile it may work the political bluff of closing down its plants, but not for long. It will open up new markets in the Far East and South, creating a new demand and procuring their share of the trade now going to England, France, and Germany. This would give its men steady employment. It would not reduce wages, and it would continue to pay dividends on its watered stock then as now.

Like everything else, it moves along the lines of least resistance. Its close monopoly of the American market and the protection given it by the Government enables it by reducing wages and laying off men in slack times to pay dividends, and it is satisfied.

In the earlier effort for special privilege for infant industries this protective toll could be paid without being felt so much by the people, for there was only an occasional infant to be cared for.

But the birth of infants has become so wonderfully prolific, and each one crying for a special privilege, until it has reached the point of swapping dollars with each other in the belief that we can tax ourselves into prosperity, like the man trying to lift himself by his boot straps.

Under the law of protection we are overtrading within ourselves and destroying our home market by our shortsighted and niggardly attitude toward the farmers and toilers of the land, who are the real producers of real wealth and real prosperity.

WHICH POLICY WOULD YOU HAVE?

We find two distinct and fundamental principles of government as represented by the Democratic and Republican Parties. The Republican Party supports the doctrine and principles of Hamilton, who believed in the concentration of power and authority in the hands of a few. Hamilton did not trust the people.

Upon the other hand, we find the principles of Democracy set forth in the life and works of Jefferson, advocating as the Democratic theory of government that in a Republic like ours there should be a wider diffusion of authority and responsibility among the people. We believe in the people and trust them, and believe that Congress and the various legislative bodies of the States should respond absolutely to the wishes of the people.

Again, we find a difference in theory and principle on the question of taxation. The Republican idea is that the Federal Government should be used for purposes other than revenue. In fact, the Republican theory is that the Government should be used to levy taxes, and, under the protective theory, a tax to cover not only the difference in cost of production here and abroad but a tax to cover and insure the manufacturer's profit, regardless of whether or not that profit is based on efficient and economical management.

THE DEMOCRATIC THEORY IS THAT THE GOVERNMENT, AS AN INSTRUMENT OF THE PEOPLE, SHOULD USE ITS TAXING POWER FOR PURPOSES OF REVENUE ONLY. THIS BELIEF I SUBSCRIBE TO ABSOLUTELY. I AM UNWILLING WHILE I REMAIN A MEMBER OF THIS CONGRESS TO BE A PARTY TO ANY ACT WHICH PERVERTS THE USE OF THE GOVERNMENT FOR THE PURPOSE OF GUARANTEEING THE PROFITS OF ANY INTEREST OR ANY MAN OR ANY SET OF MEN.

For nearly 40 years the Republican Party has had unlimited control of the Government and must assume responsibility for present economic and labor conditions.

You ask me what has high protection done for the farmer? I answer that it has driven his boys and girls from the farm into the factories and mills of the town. You have been holding the farmer and wage earner up by the throat while the Machinery Trust, the Lumber Trust, the Steel Trust, the Leather Trust, and the Beef Trust have put their hands into his pockets and filched him of the earnings which belonged to the savings of his wife and his children.

What has protection done? Go down the streets of this city, or of any city, and you will find there families living in 3 or 4 rooms who ought to have 8 or 10, families living in apartments who ought to be out enjoying the sunshine and the air in homes of their own. If this protective policy is continued, the neglect of the farming industry and the workmen of the country continued, in behalf of the favored few, the work of deterioration of American citizenship and of the American Republic has begun.

What means this wave of socialism throughout the country? What means this constant conjuring of new ways and means of so-called reforms? It means that underlying all there must come an economic change of conditions for the toiler and the producer. This change must first come by removing special privilege. The voice of the people has been heard in the last election; and remember this, the people will in the end get what they want. That which they have created they will revise or amend to suit their will. Let the United States Senate beware. Let it not trifle with this great body of a wronged people and continue to legislate in behalf of the special interests; for if they do, another election will place within that Chamber a sufficient majority to give us Democratic control of the Senate, the House, and the Presidency of the United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The world, in a commercial sense, is constantly getting smaller. Wireless telegraphy, the telephone, the railroads have made it possible for the business man at his desk to-day to be in touch with all the world. In 1950 there will be at least 200,000,000 people in the United States to be fed, clothed, and housed. We can not go on and increase our acreage in the next 50 years as we have done in the past.

The question of feeding 200,000,000 people and of supplying the world means the thorough reorganization of the agricultural industry of the country, and more especially does it mean a thorough reorganization of industrial conditions which will enable the man who has only his own energy to sell to make a profit over and above the cost of living in exchange for that energy. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, this bill is in the interest of the Government. It stands for the best interests of the farmer. It stands, as no other measure has ever stood, for the best interests of the workmen. It stands, as no other measure ever stood, for the best interests of the independent manufacturer.

The Democratic Party is laboring for legislation in behalf of the producer. It means no harm to any industry nor will it work harm to any industry. It now proposes to take up the work of reorganization and of reformation and of placing our affairs, in so far as the Government is concerned, upon a sound economic basis by reducing expenses, lowering taxes, and removing special privilege wherever found.

The Democratic Party will see that the Government of the people shall simply perform its functions as originally intended by the fathers of our country. We propose to remove the shackles of special privilege, we propose to restore to the people equal rights and equal opportunities. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

There is no politics in this question except from the viewpoint of those who choose to make it so for their own special advantage. What we desire is the common good of the country and of the people. The day of special privilege is past. Every man has an equal right to a fair deal and an equal opportunity under the law.

The taxing power of the people must be returned to the people and must be used from this time on for purposes of revenue only and not for purposes of protecting any industry, much less for the purpose of insuring a profit to special interests as provided in the last Republican platform.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] took exception to a quotation from Markham's poem entitled "The Man with the Hoe," by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES].

For the benefit of my friend from Wyoming and his colleagues, I shall read the poem:

Who loosened and let down this brutal jaw?
Whose was the hand that slanted back this brow?
Whose breath blew out the light within this brain?
Who made him dead to rapture and despair,
A thing that grieves not and that never hopes,
Stolid and stunned, a brother to the ox?
Is this the thing the Lord God made and gave
To have dominion over sea and land;
To trace the stars and search the heavens for power;
To feel the passion of eternity?
Is this the dream He dreamed who shaped the suns
And pillared the blue firmament with light?
Down all the stretch of hell to its last gulf
There is no shape more terrible than this;
More tongued with censure of the world's blind greed;
More filled with signs and portents for the soul;
More fraught with menace to the universe.
What gulfs between him and the seraphim!
Slave of the wheel of labor, what to him
Are Plato and the swing of Pleiades?
What the long reaches of the peaks of song,
The rift of dawn, the reddening of the rose?
Through this dread shape the suffering ages look;
Time's tragedy is in that aching stoop;
Through this dread shape humanity betrayed,
Plundered, profaned, and disinherited.
Cries protest to the judges of the world,
A protest that is also prophecy.
O masters, lords, and rulers in all lands—

He refers, evidently to our Republican friends. [Laughter.]

Is this the handiwork you give to God,
This monstrous thing distorted and soul quenched?
How will you ever straighten up this shape;
Give back the upward looking and the light;
Rebuild in it the music and the dream;
Touch it again with immortality;
Make right the immemorial infamies,
Perfidious wrongs, immedicable woes?
O masters, lords, and rulers in all lands,
How will the future reckon with this man?
How answer his brute question in that hour
When whirlwinds of rebellion shake the world?
How will it be with kingdoms and with kings,
With those who shaped him to the thing he is,
When this dumb terror shall reply to God,
After the silence of the centuries?

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, the type of man described by Markham is the result of the unchecked selfish power of special privilege in government and the power of concentrated wealth in individuals.

The type is found in the Russian serf, the Mexican peon, and the Egyptian fellah. He is found in every country of great military establishments.

Continue, sir, the policy of protection for another period of 50 years and he will be found on American soil. The Democratic Party believes that all men should dig and hoe their share in this struggle for a world living and world progress, but that no man should be compelled to dig and hoe all the days of all the years of his life for mere subsistence.

The Democratic Party has always been the party of the people. We represent the progressive and constructive party of the Nation. The standpatter must get out of the way. The march of human progress is on, and the Democratic Party is the instrument chosen by the people in carrying out their wishes. We have earned their confidence, and when the reports come in from the election of 1912 they will show protectionism and special privilege, with all their evils, cast to the four winds of the earth in the election of a Democratic President, a Democratic Senate, and a Democratic Congress. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HENSLEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to thank the gentleman from Alabama for extending me this opportunity to make a short talk on the free-list bill, and I want to submit, in the short time allotted me, not a carefully prepared speech, but some observations which in a general way have occurred to me. I have sat here in my seat for the last several days listening to the speeches made on this as well as on the other side of the House, all arguing and agonizing in behalf of the same people; and apparently some of the actors in this history making drama were almost moved to tears out of their great concern, as well as commiseration, for the downtrodden of this land—the farmer and the laboring man—that countless army of citizens who produce the wealth of this great country of ours, but for some reason or other are permitted to enjoy only a small portion of it. If it were possible for the whole citizenship comprising this Nation to hear the speeches made here in Congress, both pro and con, I wonder what effect it would have upon them, and in this connection I am of the opinion that if they believed everything and did not reason it out for themselves they would be in the same sad plight as the stranger who, traveling, came to where a number of roads crossed, began to look around for a signboard pointing the way he should go, when, finally discovering one, he read, "Take either one of these roads, stranger, and I'll be darned if you ain't lost." [Laughter.] So I am impressed that this would be the sad condition of our people, this great army of people for whom we are seeking to legislate, if, Mr. Chairman, it were not true that they are not so stupid. They study, they look beneath the surface, they familiarize themselves with conditions, and are thereby enabled to pass upon these important questions. And let me warn you on the other side of this Chamber, though I am a new Member, that no amount of oratory at this late day, after you have so recklessly and thoughtlessly betrayed every vestige of confidence reposed in you, will lure them from a sad recollection of your record and cause them to reverse the good work already so well begun. They can see the tracks you have made and know the direction you have been traveling; they know that you have been in undisputed control of the affairs of this Government for, lo, these many years, during which time they have eagerly watched and appealed to you for some recognition and relief from the burdens which bear down so heavily upon them, only to receive a renewal of your ante-election promises, which have proved empty and disappointing, and many times after elections you have increased their burdens.

Since 1896 the average man has been gradually losing his hold on the means of physical existence, until, by your own policy, you have placed your party in the attitude in which you now find it, and any attempt by you now to sway them momentarily or appease them by your eloquence is regarded as demagogy. I hope I may be pardoned if I make it too strong; but it appears to me, Mr. Chairman, that some few of the Members on the other side of this Chamber have studied and they employ the Barnum theory, which was that the American people like to be deceived and humbugged. At any rate, whether the people like it or not, you propose and have practiced it upon them; but I warn you that that day has gone by. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I am a raw hand in this great national factory; therefore I feel that I should proceed carefully. But I propose to say, even though I am taking a risk, I was astonished, and am astonished, at the treatment this bill has received at the hands of some of the gentlemen on the other side. You treat it lightly. You have been and are exceedingly technical. One would presume that men on the floor of this House, after having represented constituencies for years and years, would rise above those things. This, however, seems to be a part of your plan; and when I see men on the other side of this Chamber who have been the champions of the special classes against the masses opposing this bill I am convinced that it contains merit from the standpoint of the common people, and I therefore will cheerfully give it my support. In the law school I was taught not to give too much attention to technicalities, as it would cramp and narrow one's horizon and prevent him from seeing the true issues involved in the cause. This bill under consideration provides, among other things, for placing on the free list the following-named articles: Plows, tooth and disk harrows, headers, harvesters, reapers, agricultural drills and planters, mowers, horserakes, cultivators, threshing machines and cotton gins, farm wagons and farm carts, and all other agricultural implements of any kind and description; leather, boots and shoes, fence wire, wire rods, wire, woven or manufactured, for wire fencing and other kinds of wire suitable for fencing, including wire staples, all of which articles, enumerated above, these same protected American manufacturers have been selling cheaper in foreign countries, after paying cost of transportation, than to the American farmers; and this can not be disputed by the strongest protectionist on this floor. It also places upon the free list the bread and the meat and the boots and the shoes that are so absolutely necessary to the workingmen of this country, whether they work upon the farm, whether they work in the mines, in the factory, upon our great railroads, or I care not where; so, as I see it, this ought to be sufficient to convince anyone that the passage of this bill will be of great benefit to all of our people.

In taking up this free-list bill I am reminded of the question which was asked the other day by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH], Is an automobile a farming implement? Now, I would not charge the gentleman with being captious or insincere in asking that question, for such may not be true.

He may not know the difference between an automobile and a mowing machine. I recall that only a few days ago they were running some sort of motor-power lawn mower over these fine lawns about the Capitol, and I am now persuaded that this is about as near as the gentleman has ever been to a real mowing machine, and about as near as some of you gentlemen ever get to a real farming community. But do not mistake the fact, my friends, the farmers of the country know the difference between an automobile and farming implements, and that great body of men who labor, and who are usually referred to as industrial laborers, know the difference. This colloquy, therefore, emphasizes and substantiates their suspicion and makes keener their regret that this Government, baptized with the blood of patriots, supported and protected at all times by the plain people, is, under the control of the Republican Party as it exists to-day, getting further and further away in its workings from the plain people every year, and is rapidly becoming a government of, for, and by the classes instead of a government of the people. As was remarked the other day by the gentlemen from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], "when the leaders of a great party exhibit such lack of interest or knowledge concerning questions of such great importance, it means the decadence and downfall of such an organization." Lincoln's words were prophetic when, at the close of the war, he declared he could see a condition arising in this country which was appalling; that the accumulation of great wealth in the hands of a few individuals would bring more misery upon the American people than had been brought by the war between the States. What did McKinley say only a short time before the assassin's bullet laid him low? He argued for a reduction of the tariff and a curtailment of these special privileges; and to-day you find the President of the United States supporting this great Democratic principle while you of his party are opposing it. So you see your party is divided, both here and at home. Even the old Union soldiers are losing faith and confidence in you and are voting the Democratic ticket. They are opposed to "ring rule" and "bossism." They are opposed, and so are their children, to graft and corruption in any form. They love this country for which they fought, and they have taught their children to love and revere Old Glory and the sentiment that that flag represents. They do not want to see it trailed in the mire at home or abroad. They feel neglected here at Washington, and they are resentful. You can not blame them. Their boys, long since grown to manhood, are in thousands of instances all over the land proclaiming their political independence, and they, too, are resenting this neglect of and injury to their fathers, and are turning their backs upon the party of trusts and special interests and are exercising this independence in order to rescue this great Republic from its impending doom. Then do you wonder that these old veterans, possessed of the same love for country, who were patriotic and fearless enough to risk their lives upon the field of battle to preserve this Union, are deserting your party in order to again restore this Government to the people? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

It is remarkable, Mr. Chairman, what food for thought the Cleveland administration affords the gentleman on the other side of this Chamber. I do not know how they could have gotten along all these years without poor old Grover as a text. He seems to have been a great asset to the Republican Party. It reminds me of the two negroes jowering. One was cursing Jeff Davis, of Confederate fame; the other darky remarked, "Nigger, you don't know what you are talking about; if it had not been for old Jeff Davis's stirring up that fracas you never would have been a free nigger." So, I think, without Cleveland and his administration you would have been stripped of arguments in all the campaigns which have come and gone since that day. I think the leaders of the Republican Party could well afford to divert a few million dollars of their campaign fund and erect a monument, the like of which the world has never seen, to the memory of Grover Cleveland. He did not do anything to warrant this on your part, but you have used that argument so often and for so long and with so much pleasure and success that I think it would be a fitting tribute as well as a deserved recognition. Now, I would be ashamed to resort to this argument longer if I were you. It was and is false from start to finish, and you have had full knowledge of its falsity all these years. Senator Dolliver, one of the greatest Republicans who has ever graced the Senate of the United States, declared only a few months before he departed this life that he could not see the connection of the panic of 1893 with the Cleveland administration, for the panic swept over this country nearly a year before Cleveland went into office.

Why have you not referred to the Walker tariff period, a time when Democratic principles were put into force and effect which brought about an era of prosperity rarely, if ever, equaled in the history of our country?

But, my friends, we are not living in the dead past, but for to-day and for to-morrow. Fifteen years have come and gone since Cleveland was at the helm of the ship of state, and the Republican Party has had undisputed control of affairs ever since that day. The people of this Nation would have continued you as guardians of their rights had you been faithful to the trust. They reached the point where they not only saw but felt that something was wrong, and radically wrong.

In your national platform you pledged relief to that great body of citizens who eat their bread in the sweat of their faces, and who have been electing you to office all these years, but they were intelligent enough to see and know that you were legislating for the classes and the "system"; that you were making millionaires and not a prosperous people; that you were placing barriers between them and the so-called captains of industry; that you were reducing them to a condition of serfdom throughout the land; and for these reasons they have reduced you to the minority on the floor of this House. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Do you not think that they know that they, by their toil, create the wealth of this Nation? Yea, and more than that, fight the battles of this country when she is in peril, either from invasion from without or insurrection from within. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Down in my district in southeast Missouri during the last campaign the Republican spellbinders from every platform declared that the people were prosperous and happy; but, gentlemen, that did not satisfy; they had cried out for bread and you had given them a stone; they asked for a fish and you gave them a serpent. Instead of complying with their demands in reducing the tariff on the necessaries of life, as you had promised, and as was just, you increased it, and thereby increased the burdens that already lay so heavily on the toiling masses of this Nation; and for what purpose? In order to satisfy the demands of the trusts and combines of the country. Mr. Chairman, I hope and pray my God that I will live to see the day when the laws and conditions in this glorious land of ours will be so just and equitable that it will be impossible for individuals to accumulate by special privileges, at the expense of the masses, fortunes so gigantic and colossal that they know not what to do with them. [Applause on the Democratic side.] They hold in their grasp, as it were, the destinies of thousands of freemen. Why, we have instances where their wealth is so great that they have actually called upon the Government of the United States to assist them in dispensing their money, or, rather, disgorging their ill-gotten gains.

Has the still, small voice whispered to them as it did to the prophet of old? Or, rather, has it not been their consciences, knowing and realizing, as they must, the methods they have employed to despoil the people? Or, instead, has it been the terrible situation that presents itself in the crowded districts of our land, where the plaintive voices of the hungry can be heard? Such a situation presents itself, and you are fully cognizant of this fact. Look about you for a moment. You see the granaries, packing concerns, and storehouses of every kind and character, wherever you may look, and where the product of man's toil can be stored; you will find all are full to overflowing. The banks of the country, especially the banks in the large cities, have more money in them than they ever have had before, and yet the great masses of our country are not sharing in this prosperity. Great numbers of our people have not 30 days between them and an execution held by a sheriff. My Republican friends, they are not asking for much—only a just portion of the wealth they produce. Is that too much? You have many, many times told the laboring man of this country you loved him and that you wanted to protect him. How have you protected him? Let us analyze conditions for a moment. We all know, those of us who have studied the history of our country and the origin of the protective system, that it was proposed for the purpose, in the first instance, to encourage men of means who lived here and induce others to come here to engage in the manufacture of articles needed at that early primitive time of our country's history, so as to foster and build them up, and thereby enable them to become strong institutions. That process of assisting infant industries continued until they became great trusts and combines, a menace to the very existence of the power that created them. The question of protection, under the original theory, is no longer present, but has resolved itself into a question now of preserving our Nation and controlling these trusts, so as to insure our liberty and perpetuate our form of government. You have made it possible to build up such vast fortunes in this country that they have become the marvel of the world. You have permitted these trusts to plunder the people.

Let me explain. Let us get at the philosophy of the system. There are always more people that consume any given article than is required in the production of it. Now, if you place a tax upon the article to be paid by the consumer for the benefit of the producer, are you not narrowing the volume of money to that extent? That seems perfectly plain. Now, this system should not and will not endure, and can not be reconciled with the theory so often proclaimed, namely, the greatest good to the greatest number. Not only that, but, mind you, all the producers do not share in the tax; you say that they do, but that is not true—the operators get it. So you see that the extra price placed upon the consumer and paid by him must necessarily narrow down until practically a few great trusts and combines are the beneficiaries of this whole tax. Let us consider that for a moment and reason a little. I think the Good Book says, "Come thou, let us reason together." There was a time, as you remember, that you argued that the tariff was paid by the foreigner, and you succeeded in deceiving the people for a while upon that sort of specious argument, but, when finally driven from that position, you were forced to invoke the sacred name of labor. You agonized with the laboring people of the country; you insisted that you wanted to protect him and that the tax was for that purpose, but in the next breath you declared that the revenue was needed to defray the enormous expenses of the Government. Now, think of that situation. Can you imagine that the $1 collected by this system of taxation will supply all three ends—first, going as dividends to the stockholders and bondholders of these great concerns so as to enable them to contribute properly to campaign funds and spend the most of their time in Europe in riotous living—or does this same dollar go to the Government as revenue or to the laboring man? It can not go to the Government if it goes to the manufacturer, nor can it go to either of those named and yet reach the laboring man. You see clearly how preposterous that position is. Before it goes to the Government as revenue you must have bought foreign-made goods. It is the only means by which the tax you pay can become revenue, excepting when you buy articles internally taxed. If you buy homemade articles, then it resolves itself into a question between the two—the employer and the employee—as to who receives the tax the consumer in that case pays. Let me make a homely illustration.

If it were possible that when we buy an article of consumption we could know just what the article we buy cost in labor and exactly what it is taxed; as, for instance, we go into a furnishing store and examine a garment, and the clerk quotes a price of $10, we inquire of him what this $10, the price of the garment, represents. The clerk explains that it represents the raw material, whatever cotton or wool is in the garment, plus the labor that has been expended on it, transportation, and the profit to the merchant. We thereupon advise him to wrap up the garment, and upon paying for it proceed on our way, whereupon a revenue collector taps us on the shoulder and inquires what is in our bundle; and upon investigation the revenue officer informs us that there is $5 tariff duty to be paid. We would turn to the officer and ask him if that is the tariff that we have heard so much about, and if this money goes to the Treasury of the United States to defray the expenses of the Government? The officer answers us: If it is a foreign-made article, it does; but if a domestic-made article, he would say, It does not; that only in the case of purchasing foreign-made articles does this tariff go into the Treasury of the United States. Then, would we not inquire of the officer where is this money presumed to go; and he would explain to us that it goes to the manufacturer of the garment. For what purpose, Mr. Officer? The officer would then explain that it is to encourage the manufacturer who is engaged in that particular business; and, further, to enable him to pay better wages to his employees. Does the manufacturer use any portion of this money with which to pay better wages to his employees? Not necessarily. The communities where these great factories are usually located have such a supply of laborers, and competition between the men employed is so keen, that the employer does not have to pay any of this tariff to his men. He always employs the man who will turn off the most work for the least money; so that he does not have to pay out any of this $5 tariff money to the laboring men. It would be different if competition were keen between employers to get men; that is, if there were more jobs than men to fill them; but under prevailing conditions they are not compelled to pay out any of this $5 to the laboring man; it is therefore possible for them to put this tariff money in their coffers.

I would like to see a system devised akin, and in some respects bearing resemblance, to the pure-food law, so that when a purchaser buys an article he would be able to determine its relevant parts, the costs of manufacture, the tariff, and all, so that at the end of any stated period he could ascertain just how much revenue he pays the Government and just the amount he contributes to further enrich the few. In other words, to reveal the hand of the taxgatherer. Now, then, let us get back and see how the workingman fares. In addition to all these things mentioned, all these years, you have said that you wanted to protect the workingman of this country against the cheap pauper labor of Europe, and notwithstanding this, by some means or other, you have permitted the great ship companies to bring in millions of the cheapest kind of pauper labor, and they are put into active competition with the American boys in the shops, the great factories, and mines of our country. Not only that, they bring all the abominable habits and practices of their native lands with them, and in a great many instances live under conditions here such as no bright-faced, intelligent American boy would think of living under. Nor is that all. I am informed that a certain class of them send about 40 per cent of their earnings back to the country from whence they came. As was declared the other day in the course of a magnificent speech by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] on the floor of this House, they send back annually to the country from whence they came between $250,000,000 and $300,000,000. Think of it, my friends. Is that a healthy condition of affairs? No one objects to people coming to this land from any country on the face of God's earth to enjoy all our rights and liberties when they come possessed of the right motives, and propose, when they come, to study our institutions and laws with a view of becoming citizens and shouldering the burdens of Government. We welcome all who come to assume the responsibilities of citizenship, assisting us in protecting in every way possible the liberties of our country, so as to transmit this Government to those who are to follow us, with the principles underlying it as pure and unsullied as they were when our forefathers established it.

Then there is another phase to this proposition that I wish to discuss. Within the last few decades, in addition to the sharp competition that has been produced by bringing foreigners here, there have been vast improvements made in mechanics, in machinery of every kind, until we have reached the point, I have observed, that one man with improved machinery can to-day turn off as much work as three men could have done 10 years ago. Still the one man is not getting much better wages, if any, than each of the three received theretofore for the same amount of work. At any rate the saving which has resulted by reason of the change has not been shared by the one that remains, and yet the tariff, which you claim protects the laboring man, remains on the three; so you see, without further argument, in reality the machinery gets two-thirds of the protection, and there, then, begins a guessing contest between the employer and the employee to determine who gets the other one-third. The workingman guesses he will get it and the employer guesses he will not, and in all these respects you see the laboring man does not receive a square deal. [Applause on the Democratic side.] You have legislated for the benefit of the few, and you have thereby been centralizing the wealth of the country until to-day practically a few men control all the business interests and affairs of the country. For instance, it was said the other day that Carnegie in 1893, when the panic struck the country, was worth, all told, $10,000,000, and 10 years thereafter he had so organized and capitalized his properties and watered the stock that he was able to collect dividends on $360,000,000. Think of that. He started cramping the people of this country in the panic of 1893 and in 10 years' time added $350,000,000 to his wealth. It has been said on the floor of this House—and it has not been challenged or disputed—that when the 24 directors of the United States Steel Trust sit down to their table that one-twelfth of the wealth of the United States is represented in their chairs; and, further, that 1 per cent of the American people own more property than the other 99 per cent, while 5,500,000 American families, or 44 per cent of our people, own an average of only $150 per family. We boast of having something like $33 per capita.

Now, if you would add the combined wealth of a million of the wealthiest and subtract their wealth from the total volume of money and then divide the remainder among the other, say 90,000,000 of people, I declare to you there would not be $7 apiece. This condition, compared with 50 years ago, when there were not one-half dozen millionaires in the United States, makes an alarming parallel. You have permitted this condition to continue until the people have grown tired of your cant and hypocrisy; and when you failed to carry out the pledges of your last platform, made in Chicago in 1908, to relieve the masses of the burdens heaped upon them by increasing the cost of all necessaries, they revolted. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

You promised, in the last Congress when you were in power, to lessen the price of shoes, but instead you increased the price.

And again the people looked to you for relief from the food trusts and the cold-storage plants of this country where millions of dollars of foodstuffs, the product of man's toil, is stored; and, very often, being held for speculative purposes until decay begins, in order to compel the consumer to pay the unreasonable and extortionate prices. Do not talk to me about the farmer getting the benefit of these prices. I know, and the farmers know, and you also know that he does not. I am, therefore, glad of the opportunity that this bill affords me to appeal in behalf of the farmer and the laborer. I was born and reared upon a farm back in Jefferson County among as good people as ever lived, and spent the early and best days of my life among them; and sometimes in my soliloquy I am reminded of the poet and can appreciate his inspiration, when he wrote:

> The king sat on his jeweled throne, and he heaved a sigh that was like a groan, for his crown was hard, and it bruised his head, and his scepter weighed like a pig of lead; the ladies smirked as they came to beg; the knights were pulling the royal leg. The king exclaimed, "If I had my wish I would cut this out, and I'd go and fish. For what is pomp to a weary soul that yearns and yearns for the fishing hole! The throne's a bore and the crown a gaud, and I'd swap the lot for a bamboo rod and a can of worms and a piece of string, but there's no such luck for a poor old king." And a boy who passed by the palace high, to fish for trout in the streamlet nigh, looked up in awe at the massive walls and caught a glimpse of the marble halls, and said to himself, "Oh, hully chee; wisht I was the king and the king was me! To reign all day with your crown on straight is a whole lot better'n diggin' bait and fishin' around when the fish won't bite and gettin' licked for your luck at night."

[Laughter and applause.]

These same conditions that inspired the poet exist to-day back on my old home place; and the same good people there whom I love are but the type of people who cultivate the soil everywhere. I own a farm myself, my people are farmers, and some of my very best and dearest friends are farmers. I am, therefore, doubly anxious to secure the relief to them which the passage of this bill promises, so that I can return home, look them in the face and say, I have done my duty.

And again, referring to labor conditions, I remember that Gov. Hadley, Republican governor of Missouri, before the last election, when speaking along this line, declared that 10 per cent of the American people did not get enough to eat. What does that mean? It means that 9,000,000 of our people, men, women, and children, are hungry and are not properly provided for. It is an appalling situation in this land of plenty, where there is an abundance of everything to supply the wants of everybody. It seems to me that instead of a panic, and our people going hungry, we should have a picnic. I say to you that prosperity, as some of you define it, does not satisfy the wants of the common people of the country, or, if it did, the factories of our land would not be crowded with little children, boys and girls, toiling for bread when they should be in school receiving such training as will prepare them to take up the responsibilities of citizenship which will later devolve upon them.

No, you did not keep your anteelection promises made to the people. But there were other things besides these mentioned that caused them to revolt. The people were discontented; they were demanding information, and how and from whom did they receive it? Why, from such men as Senator Dolliver, Senator LA FOLLETTE, and Senator CUMMINS, Republican United States Senators, who would not longer stand for the deal of surrendering the people further into the grasp of the trusts and the combines. The Sugar Trust, by means of false weights and otherwise, stole millions of dollars that should have gone into the United States Treasury, which would thereby have reduced the amount the common people had to pay; and, in addition to this, enormous sums of money were lost, strayed, or stolen from various subtreasuries over our country, yet the culprits went unwhipped of justice.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri five minutes more.

Mr. HENSLEY. Nor is this all. You created Federal jobs for your pets within the last 10 years to the extent of 300,000 or more; nor does it stop with that. Senator Aldrich declared in the United States Senate, that great deliberative body at the other end of the Capitol, that if he were a business man he could run this Government and save to the people $300,000,000 per annum. The enormous sum of $300,000,000 of the people's money being uselessly and extravagantly expended. Now, since you have gone out of power, been removed from the lower House of this legislative branch of Government, I wonder what must be your feelings when you have witnessed the magnificent record made by the Democrats. What have the Democrats done in the way of living up to their pledges and keeping their promises to the people? The first thing we did was to take CHAMP CLARK, "the greatest Roman of them all," and elevate him to the Speaker's chair. He, who by his rugged honesty and fidelity to every trust, as is illustrated by the maxim he used in the conclusion of his speech, "he who serves his country best serves his party best," has endeared himself not only to the people of Missouri, but to the people of our whole country, who believe in a square deal and an equal chance. [Prolonged applause.]

And the caucus, as an evidence of good faith, cut off enough surplus and useless jobs to make a saving of $183,000 annually to the people of the United States; passed the resolution providing for direct election of United States Senators; passed the bill providing for the publicity of campaign expenses before as well as after election; and the reciprocity bill; and now have under consideration the free-list bill which we, in the House, will pass. I would not, however, attempt to predict the final action of the Republican Senate in their consideration of this bill. It may meet the same fate there as the Sulloway bill and other long-delayed measures of justice met in the last Congress. However, I am only responsible to my people for my course in this House, and when I discharge fully every obligation here they will not hold me accountable for the action of the Republican Senate.

There is one thing I desire to mention here, which, as it appears to me, is proof sufficient that this House can rise above partisanship and petty things which sometimes control party caucuses, as we, actuated by patriotism and humanity, selected that old veteran and man of God, who had lost his sight in the service of his country in the Union Army, as Chaplain of this House. Republican though he is, no other name was submitted before the caucus, and, as I see it, that was as it should have been. One should at all times rise above partisanship when the demands of humanity or country are presented.

Respecting the Canadian reciprocity bill, our people, the farmers, sell a great many things to Canada and have been selling them for some time, and upon a great many of these articles the farmers have sold into Canada there has been a tariff, and the ultimate consumer in Canada is compelled to pay the extra price placed upon those articles by way of a tariff. On the other hand, Canada has many things we need upon which a tariff is also placed, and before we can get those articles we have to pay this tariff. Now, to what extent do we trade with Canada? Let us consult the Government statistics, which show as follows:

For the last five years, ending June 30, in spite of the tariff obstructions, in goods of kinds—
We sold to Canada	$886,417,376
Canada sold to us	393,913,673
Difference in our favor	492,503,703
Horses:
We sold in Canada	14,172,075
Canada sold to us	2,549,201
Difference in our favor	11,622,874
Cattle:
We sold in Canada	1,578,179
Canada sold to us	1,193,796
Difference in our favor	384,383
Breadstuffs:
We sold in Canada	31,596,556
Canada sold to us	6,679,844
Difference in our favor	24,916,712

So you see the balance of trade is in our favor. How, then, can reciprocity hurt the farmer?

The free-list bill, together with the reciprocity bill, is therefore a long step in the right direction in affording relief to the farmers and laborers of this country in the way of providing free tools and implements of every kind.

It is now generally admitted that, even from the protection standpoint, no protection whatever is needed by our great corporations and trusts which manufacture hoops, bands, and ties of iron and steel, and wire such as used for baling agricultural products, together with wire strand and rope, wire rods and barbed wire and other forms of wire used for fencing. By reason of existing high duties our people are dependent for these articles on our giant steel industry, which has captured for its products a large share of the markets of the world. It is a matter of common knowledge that our manufacturers of wire, hoops, ties, and other forms of steel have for years sold, and probably now do sell, their products abroad at much lower prices than to domestic consumers. The high protection they have enjoyed has enabled them to make this unfair discrimination against our own people. The removal of the duties on these iron and steel articles generally and necessarily used by our agricultural producers, as well as by many others, will effect a considerable saving to them, and this, like the provisions of the bill generally, is a long-delayed measure of equity and justice.

I believe that we are now at a point, if not a crisis, in the history of our country and race where every citizen and freeman is called upon to exercise the very highest degree of patriotism and manhood in order to vouchsafe our liberties. When you imagine it is going to be an easy task to shake the barnacles from the old ship of state you are deluding yourself. Do you not know it is going to be a struggle wherein the souls of men will be tried to restore this Government to the people as it was originally intended? Do you not know the beneficiaries of the system, the continuation of which means untold millions in their coffers, will resort to every means within their power, every means that human skill and ingenuity can devise, to hold onto the graft which has been afforded them by their control of the Republican Party. Organizations will be perfected, individual Congressmen will be petitioned, the press of the country, if possible, will be subsidized, and space in the magazines and farm and labor journals, wherever possible, will be bought in order to continue their system of exploiting the people; and I appeal to you and to the country not to permit these organizations, such as the American Protective League and others, composed of millionaires, the beneficiaries of the tariff, to influence you from your course of duty, but be true to self, to your country, and to your God.

What we need most of all is just a spark of the old spirit of patriotism, the fire that characterized our forefathers in the establishment of this country, the spirit of manhood, if we may hope to emancipate the American people and strike the shackles from the hand of toil. As was said on the floor of the House the other day, and I repeat it, "Shall the American millions be freemen or serfs?" And I ask you, shall the Government protect those who should be protected or shall it be used as an instrument in the hands of the strong to crush the weak? Let us resolve now and henceforth to protect our liberty at any cost, uphold her hands, and not suffer her to be slain in her own temple, and there to gaze upon for the last time the lifeless, bleeding form of what once was the only hope of humanity and a constitutional form of government; once a world power, attained by her ideals and recognition of human rights, and thereby also maintained that relation rather than by her Army and Navy. When you put the moral force behind the individual, or the Nation if you please, you have nothing to fear.

In conclusion, I wish to say that we must rest our cause with the plain people of our country, who do not expect, nor do they desire, any advantage over their neighbor. They are the hope and refuge of our country, the patriotic, God-loving, and God-serving men. Then, if we be worthy sons of worthy sires, we will, so far as we can, give to them a Government and administration which will insure a square deal and an equal chance in the race of life, and in 1912 they will renew their confidence and we our covenants, and they will place us in possession of every department of this Government. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ANSBERRY].

Mr. ANSBERRY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the discussion of the reciprocity pact and of the pending measure, the farmers' free-list bill, so called, has developed on the floor of this House, in addition to a considerable fund of valuable information, two new schools of economic thought. The first, presided over by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HINDS], might be called the school of equilibrium; but this university was but short lived, by reason of the fact that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MOSS], with the aid of a long memory and a copy of the Breeders' Gazette, assaulted it so vigorously as completely to upset the equilibrium between the factory and the farm, which this new philosophy was supposed to support.

My colleague—I may say my distinguished colleague—who is a member of the Ways and Means Committee and from the great State of Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH], is perhaps the person who has charge of the destiny of the other school. The gentleman from Ohio claims to be something of an agriculturist, not a farmer; the distinction being that a farmer makes money from the farm and an agriculturist expends money on the farm.

It would be rather hard to define this new school, for the reason that when the gentleman was presenting his argument on the question of reciprocity, in his modesty he admitted that he had some considerable part in the origin of the reciprocity bill which was introduced in the Sixty-first Congress and which he supported with his voice and his vote.

These arguments, which he proclaimed so zealously for reciprocity, are in direct opposition to his position on the farmers' free-list bill. So that we have a new idea, one week a free trader—because I think witnesses summoned from his own side of the House demonstrate beyond peradventure that anyone who supported the reciprocity pact was a free trader, and I suppose that applies to the distinguished leader of the minority [Mr. MANN]—at any rate, my colleague, being opposed to the position he took on reciprocity, has destroyed his own school. In other words, one week he is a protectionist and the next week a free trader, and that would naturally put his followers in a very equivocal position. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

The gentleman affected to have a great deal of regard for the manufacturers of shoes, so much so that he said in the course of his speech that the so-called farmers' free list had no thought of the manufacturers, but it only had consideration for the consumer. I say to the gentleman, in my opinion it is high time that the consumer had his day in court. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I think his day has arrived. I am advised that no inconsiderable number of shoes are manufactured in the narrow confines of my colleague's district. I had supposed that the farmers' free-list bill was a complement to the reciprocity pact, and that a supporter of the one would logically be a contender for the other. We are told by the gentleman that putting shoes on the free list strikes a blow at the very foundations of the Republican theory of protection. I agree with the gentleman, and go further, and say that his party carried a commission from the people in the last Congress to do this selfsame thing, but they violated their trust, and now we are seeking through the medium of this proposed free list to give the farmer, the laborer, the mechanic, the lawyer, and the doctor, and everyone else in this country following any useful avocation, the benefit of a competitive market.

My colleague states that he is afraid of the effect this will have upon the manufacturer of shoes. While it is not our purpose to do anyone an injustice, we think that first consideration should be given to the large number who use shoes rather than to the few who are engaged in the manufacture of them. No one disputes the proposition laid down so eloquently by the gentleman that shoes are not trust controlled. No; they are not; but leather and shoe machinery, both necessary to the manufacture of shoes, are trust controlled, and a resolution has been introduced into this House looking to the investigation of the giant monopoly engaged in the manufacture of shoe machinery which has such a strangle hold upon the manufacture of shoes. But the gentleman need have no fears as to the ability of American shoe manufacturers to take care of themselves without the intervention of a high protective tariff. When the Payne bill was under consideration Wolf Bros., shoe manufacturers, located at Columbus, Ohio, advised the Members of the Sixty-first Congress by letter that they were not solicitous for a protective tariff on the products of their factory and that they were ready and willing to meet the shoe manufacturers of the world, and, as I recall it, they did not require the alternative of free hides. My colleague says that he received no such letter. The Wolf brothers, besides being manufacturers of shoes, are the proprietors and publishers of two great newspapers in the State of Ohio which have long been supporters of the Republican Party and its policies, and it is strange that in sending out letters to Members of Congress in the Sixty-first Congress advising them of their views on this all-important question that they should have omitted my colleague from Cincinnati, who was then on the Ways and Means Committee and high in the councils of the Republican organization of the Buckeye State. Can it be that these two great journals were opposed to the policies and political associates of my colleague?

During the discussion of this bill much has been said concerning its effect on the wages of men employed in industries engaged in the manufacture of those articles contained in the free list. This is not surprising for the reason that whenever an attempt is made to lower the tariff on any product that has been receiving the benefit of special privilege a howl immediately goes up that it is an assault upon wages and wage earners. This, of course, is the veriest fallacy. Everyone who has given the subject even passing thought must agree with all who have written truthfully upon this subject, that low-priced labor does not mean cheap production, and it is the comparative, not the absolute, cost of production that determines exchanges. We have but to look around to see that even in the same occupation, wages paid for labor whose products sell freely together are generally higher in large cities than in small towns, as they are higher in new parts of the United States than in the old, as they are higher in some parts of one State than in another. The American workingmen do not have to fear in our markets the products of cheap foreign labor, but the importation to our labor markets of that labor itself. Here, then, is the fallacy with reference to the protection of American wage earners, which, while imposing duties upon goods under the pretense that they are made by pauper labor, freely admits pauper labor itself. The American Congress in the past did not consider that there was as much danger in the importation of Chinese commodities as the importation of Chinese labor. On some of the former there is a tariff which has a tendency to keep out Chinese goods, while on the latter there is an absolute prohibition which does keep out Chinese labor. Our protective tariff on commodities undoubtedly raises the price of commodities, but the raising of the price of wages has not been accomplished by this cause.

It is a fact which no one can dispute that the highest protected industries in the United States are the industries which are the most frequently affected by strikes. And why do employees strike? Protection secures the employer from foreign competition, but in no way attempts to lessen competition among those who must sell their labor. There is no provision in any tariff law compelling employers benefited by protection to share these benefits with their workmen.

The proposition that protection raises wages involves two assumptions: First, that an increase in the profits of employers means an increase in the wages of their workmen.

Second, that an increase in the wages in protected occupations involves an increase in the wages in all occupations.

To state these assumptions is to show their absurdity. Is there anyone who really supposes that because an employer makes larger profits he therefore pays higher wages?

The late Henry George, from whose great work, Protection or Free Trade, I have borrowed most of the statements made with reference to labor, relates an instance in point. He told of riding on the platform of a Brooklyn horse car and a conversation which he had with the driver, who complained bitterly of his long hours, hard work, and poor pay; how he was chained a veritable slave to his car and by so doing he could scarcely get enough to keep his wife and family and could not save anything for a rainy day. Mr. George suggested to him the feasibility of getting the legislature or city council to pass a law or ordinance permitting the street-car company to charge a 6 instead of a 5 cent fare, so as to enable them to raise the wages of their employees. The driver, with an incredulous smile, said that that would make no difference in his condition, and further stated that if the fare was raised from 5 cents to 60 cents the company would not pay a penny more in wages. It was not a question what they made, continued the driver, but how cheaply they could get some one to take his place. With increased income the company would pay higher dividends, said the driver, or increase their stock, but would never raise the pay of their employees until compelled to.

This driver stated an elemental and basic fact. The buyers of labor, with but few exceptions, pay what they are compelled to or what their own selfish interest dictates they shall pay. Where there are two men applying for one job the wages paid for that job will be lower than if there were two jobs seeking to employ one man. Labor organizations have had by far more to do with the high wages paid in America than anything else, although in comparing the wages paid in America with the wages paid abroad many things must be considered, as many things enter into the equation. The density of population, of course, is a great factor, and the population per square mile of America as compared with the population per square mile in England or Continental Europe, of course, is much more favorable to America than England or Europe. That the tariff does have no appreciable effect upon wages and wage earners is illustrated by the fact that free-trade England pays higher wages for every line of work than does protective Germany, France, or Belgium.

A gentleman engaged in the business of manufacturing window glass, which enjoys a high protective duty, visited Washington recently for the purpose of trying to arrange for reciprocity with Canada that would permit the glass manufacturers of the United States to sell their wares in that country, and, in the course of the conversation, he stated that the glass industry was at a standstill; that wages of glass blowers had steadily decreased in spite of the high protective tariff; that recently some Belgian glass blowers had left his employment and returned to Belgium, because the wages in the United States as compared with the cost of living were not as inviting as conditions in their own country, and Belgium pays lower wages than France, England, or Germany.

I can not refrain from referring to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL], who discussed this wage question in connection with the free-list bill in the House yesterday. The gentleman always affords the House much information whenever he speaks. In the course of his speech yesterday he told us of a journey that he made through Great Britain a few years ago, and I think that journey has a great historical parallel in the journey of one Mr. Pickwick, known to fame as the founder of the Pickwick Club, and Mr. Pickwick, like our distinguished colleague, while journeying through that country made notes of the things which he observed which were of interest to be reported back to the members of his famous club who were not so fortunate as to be able to travel about their native country. Both of these distinguished gentlemen summoned a cab and both engaged the cabman in conversation. The gentleman from Connecticut advised us that he asked the cab driver whether or not he was the owner of the cab. Receiving a negative reply, he further pursued the conversation by asking the wages which he received. The cab driver told him that he received but $2.50 per week for 13 hours per day. Of course our colleague gave the poor cabman a generous tip, which, of course, was just the effect the cab driver intended his story should have. But to return to our friend Pickwick. Mr. Pickwick inquired as to the age of the horse, and the cabman, after a side glance at Mr. Pickwick, answered, "42."

Thereupon Mr. Pickwick, not so gullible as some travelers, exclaimed doubtfully, "What!"

The cab driver reiterated his former statement. Mr. Pickwick carefully scrutinized the man's face, but his features were immovable; so, convinced, Mr. Pickwick noted down the fact of the horse's age.

"And how long do you keep him out at a time?" inquired Mr. Pickwick, searching for further information.

"Two or three weeks," replied the man.

"Weeks!" said Mr. Pickwick in astonishment—and out came the notebook again.

"He lives at Pentonwil when he's at home," observed the driver, cooly, "but we seldom takes him home on account of his weakness."

"On account of his weakness," reiterated the perplexed Mr. Pickwick.

"He always falls down when he's took out o' the cab," continued the driver, "but when he's in it we bears him up werry tight, and takes him in werry short, so as he can't werry well fall down, and we've got a pair o' precious large wheels on; so ven he does move, they run after him, and he must go on—he can't help it."

Mr. Pickwick entered every word of this statement in his notebook, with the view of communicating it to the club as a singular instance of the tenacity of life in horses under trying circumstances.

I was unable to follow the reasoning of the gentleman from Connecticut in that I could not see what possible effect this farmers' free bill or a protective tariff would have upon cabmen engaged in carting people about the cities of the United States. By an inspection of tariff bills I have been unable to find that any protection was ever attempted to be afforded to cab drivers in the United States in competition with cab drivers in Great Britain or anywhere else. Neither does an inspection of the farmers' free list throw any light upon the subject. It can not be that the gentleman believes that taking the tariff off of farm wagons can have any possible effect upon cab drivers in Great Britain.

We are all interested in this question of high wages, and I am sure that all of us would deem it a pleasure to pass any legislation within the bounds of reason that would have this effect. But I deny that a high protective tariff would bring about the desired results, and I say, as I said before, that men engaged in the industries which are the most highly protected, or rather employees—for unfortunately they are not all men—receive lower wages than employees of other industries not protected, and that, in other words, the men engaged in industries not protected receive the highest wages in the United States.

I need only suggest a few instances in proof of this proposition, so he who runs may read. Bricklayers, blacksmiths, carpenters, masons, painters, machinists, railroad men, and last, but by no means least, the merry plumber, receive a great deal higher wage than that paid men in any other industry, whether protected or not; and no one can contend that the product of the employees on a railroad could, by any process of reasoning, be protected by a tariff bill, and so it is with the bricklayer, the plumber, the carpenter, and others engaged in various useful avocations, carrying out the God-given mandate, earning their bread in the sweat of their face.

Consider the absurdity of a bricklayer or a plumber, a carpenter or a railroad man, engaged in their different callings, in far-away England or continental Europe, or Japan, or India, or anywhere that our friends of the minority contend that labor receives a scant wage, being engaged in the production of a commodity which could be made the subject of an import duty. Impossible, of course. And by the same token it would be impossible to draw up a tariff bill which could effect any difference in their wage. During the pendency in this country of high protective-tariff laws wages have been high and low. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

It is stated, and we can readily believe it, that while we were still colonies of Great Britain wages were much higher here than in Great Britain, and so it continued all the time prior to 1846, when Great Britain likewise had protective-tariff laws. Therefore we have the right to conclude that wages are not affected by the tariff, be it high or be it low.

The men and women employed in the textile industry, which receives the highest rate of protection under our protective-tariff laws, receive the lowest wage. The men engaged in the steel industry receive, comparatively speaking, very low wages. I am informed that the average wage paid by the United States Steel Corporation is between $600 and $700 per year, and it must be borne in mind that, to make up this average, we are taking into account the high-priced salaries paid the president and other pets of this corporation. No one will contend that the wages paid by the steel corporation are alarmingly high, or anywhere near commensurate with the protection afforded this concern. So it is with almost every industry that receives the benefits of high protection.

Something has been said, with reference to the farmers' free bill, of the panic of 1894. Some have called it the Grover Cleveland panic, other the Democratic free-trade panic. These are familiar arguments. We heard them in the long ago, and therefore we experience the pleasurable sensations of meeting an old friend. This argument is not so ancient, however, as the now discarded cry that the "Foreigner, not the consumer, pays the tariff," and still it is not as old as that discredited shibboleth, "Let the tariff be revised by the friends of the tariff." With reference to the alleged Grover Cleveland and free-trade panic it should not be necessary to do so, but I shall take a few moments to once more call attention to the facts relative to the panic which began in the United States not in 1894, not in 1893, but in 1892.

The Wilson tariff bill, as all know, was not a low-tariff bill, but was as much a protective measure as the bill that preceded it. This tariff bill, which was passed in 1894, unless it could have been retroactive, could not have produced the panic which began in 1892, with the Homestead strike in Pennsylvania, long before the Democratic Party had been vested with power.

Let us examine the record. We find that when this strike began in 1892 the McKinley tariff law was upon the statute books, a Republican administration was in charge of every branch of the Federal Government and continued in charge until March 4, 1893. Mr. Cleveland was nominated by the Democracy for a third time in 1892, and the campaign issue between the two great parties, which resulted in an overwhelming victory for Democracy, was the tariff, nothing else was discussed that could obscure the issue, and upon that issue Grover Cleveland and his party were swept into power, and they, like their Republican predecessors, were given control of every branch of the Government.

It will be recalled that in addition to the solid South, Mr. Cleveland carried many Northern States, including such strongholds of Republicanism as Illinois, Wisconsin, Indiana, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Delaware, parts of Michigan, California, and North Dakota, one elector in Ohio, and but for the fact that a new voting system was being inaugurated he undoubtedly would have gotten the balance of the electors in Ohio.

I recite these things because when cornered our opponents will admit that the panic began before Cleveland was inaugurated and before the passage of the Wilson tariff bill, but that the doctor, the lawyer, the merchant, the farmer, the clerk, the clergyman, and all the others of our citizens, who, after a full and free discussion and understanding of the question at issue, had decided that they wanted the tariff reduced, and having put the machinery in motion to reduce the tariff became afraid that they were going to get what they wanted and thereupon turned tail and precipitated a panic. This idea will not bear analysis. This sort of reasoning does not appeal to the thoughtful or intelligent man, be he legislator or private citizen.

It is the old bugaboo raised by the friends of protection, whom I have shown are not the friends of high wages. This panic was a world panic. It started in the early nineties in the Argentine Republic, due to successive crop failures, and spread all over the world. The truth of the matter is that while we had a panic in this country between 1892 and 1897, trade conditions were equally bad in our neighboring country, Canada, in Mexico, in the Argentine Republic, in England, in Continental Europe, and almost everywhere in the civilized world. We have had many panics under high protective tariff laws, the most notable one being from 1873 to 1878; and during that period we had a high protective tariff law.

Again we had a panic, and a most remarkable one it was, beginning October 27, 1907, and which was more severe, as you all remember, than any panic this country has experienced in years. More banks failed during this panic in 60 days than failed from 1892 to 1897, and the Dingley high protective tariff law during this panic was upon the statute books in full force and effect. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Can the gentleman [Mr. UNDERWOOD] yield me some more time?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield the gentleman additional time.

Mr. ANSBERRY. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], or some one in the discussion of reciprocity on the other side, said that this talk of cementing the bond between our country and our sister on the north was merely sentiment. I do not recall whether he used the term "puerile" or not, but he said, in a deprecatory sort of way, that it was sentiment.

I want you gentlemen to reflect a moment on the part that sentiment has played in the destiny of our great country. Columbus would never have discovered America but for sentiment, as with bowed head he walked the streets of the Spanish capital, deserted by royalty and mocked by the common people. What was it but the most sublime sentiment that kept his strong soul, the great soul of America's first admiral, true to its purpose? Nothing but sentiment, a sentiment which aimed to give the people of the Old World additional opportunities in the New. What was it that in the bosom of those men who in 1776 sat in convention together in the neighboring city of Philadelphia and brought forth the Declaration of Independence? Sentiment—and a sentiment of the highest kind. What but sentiment, a sentiment of patriotism, inspired the strong hearts and resolute will of Oliver Hazard Perry and his men as they built their boats on the bleak bank of Lake Erie and as they later on fought the good fight and destroyed the British fleet at Put-in-Bay? What but sentiment caused the flower of our youth to go forth and engage in the greatest struggle of which history preserves a record—the Civil War? What caused our young men to battle for the flag in the darkest days of our Republic from 1861 to 1865? Was it the $13 per month which they received in depreciated currency? No; they were not taking thought of the $13 per month. They were animated by the highest sentiment; and if you eliminate sentiment from the great address made by Abraham Lincoln on the field at Gettysburg, during the progress of that war, there would be nothing left but meaningless words. Humane sentiment caused the War with Spain, and so we have seen that sentiment has played a great part in our history, even from the time of the discovery of our country to this very day, as it has played a great part in the history of every nation in this world. [Applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. WARBURTON].

Mr. WARBURTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that I shall vote for this bill, even if the amendments proposed shall fail. I think a number of the objections made by the gentleman from Illinois in his argument before the committee were well taken but not fatal to the bill. I think the bill would be a better one if some of the objections made by the gentleman from Illinois were concurred in. I think the bill would be an immensely better one if its scope was enlarged so as to include sugar and rice and all food products which we do not produce in sufficient quantities to supply our home consumption. I do not believe in taxing any food products, directly or indirectly, which we can not produce in this country economically and which the country is not adapted to raising. I think it is utterly indefensible to tax a necessary food product when the soil, climate, and the cost of labor are all heavily against its economical production. In proposing to place sugar on the free list, I am in accord with the Republican policy which prevailed from the end of the Civil War up to the time of the enactment by the Republicans, in control, of the McKinley law. From the time of the close of the Civil War up to the enactment of the McKinley law, which placed all sugar below No. 16 Dutch standard in color on the free list, each succeeding tariff after the close of the Civil War made a substantial reduction in the tariff on sugar, until finally all sugar below No. 16 Dutch standard in color was placed on the free list by the McKinley Act.

Our tariff on sugar in 1864 was very heavy on account of the enormous expenditure of money for the war. The tariff was from 3 to 5 cents per pound. This was reduced by the Republican tariff of 1870 to a rate of 1¾ cents to 4 cents per pound. The Republican tariff of 1883 reduced the duty on sugar and fixed the rate from 1⅜ cents to 3½ cents per pound. The McKinley Act lowered the duty on sugar still further, making the tariff on all sugar above No. 16 Dutch standard one-half a cent and placed sugar below this color on the free list, where it remained until the Democratic Wilson Tariff Act of 1894, when a tariff was placed on sugar of 40 per cent ad valorem, which, according to the prevailing prices of sugar during those three years, was more than 1 cent per pound. Now, my proposed amendment is simply in line with the doctrine of the Republican Party from the time of the war up to the time of the adoption of the McKinley law.

THE TARIFF INCREASES THE PRICE OF SUGAR TO THE CONSUMER THE FULL AMOUNT OF THE DUTY.

One of the first and essential basic facts to be determined in the discussion of the tariff on sugar is, What effect does the amount of tariff we levy have on the cost of sugar to the consumer? How much, if any, does it increase the cost? It seems to me as clear as day that the sugar in this country costs at least $1.90 a hundred pounds, the present tariff, more than it would cost if we bought our sugar in the open markets of the world. I think it costs a little more than the tariff because the tariff has placed the control of this industry in the hands of a trust, which derives more than a fair profit. I say that when granulated sugar sells in New York to the wholesaler at $4.90 per hundred it would cost him $1.90 less, or $3 per hundred, if he could purchase it in the open market. A comparison of the markets of London, New York, and Hamburg, taking into consideration the tariff rates of Great Britain and this country, shows that this is true. A review of the prevailing prices in the markets of London, Hamburg, and

New York and other sugar centers for a period of 10 years demonstrates this to be a fact. I do not suppose that there will be any dispute on this point. Mr. Lowry, of New York, recently published a pamphlet on sugar in which he presented this point clearly and forcibly. On page 1 of that pamphlet he says:

The price of all refined sugar in the United States is based on the inbound value of foreign raw sugar, plus the duty and cost of refining, and in the same way the value of raw sugar produced in Louisiana and our colonies is based on the inbound value of foreign sugars, plus the duty. Domestic raw sugar is produced in Louisiana, Porto Rico, Hawaii, and the Philippines, and is in turn sold to our refiners, while refined sugar is manufactured in the domestic beet-sugar plants. So that a clear idea may be obtained of the effect of our tariff on the value of foreign and domestic raw sugar. I refer to the following sales made December 5, 1910, to the National Sugar Refining Co., of New York:

	Cents.
4,500 bags of Surinam centrifugals, at 2.315 cents cost, insurance, and freight, for 96° test, the parity duty paid New York of	4
1,000 bags Porto Rico centrifugals, delivered New York, basis 96° test, at	4
5,000 bags Louisiana centrifugals, delivered New York, basis 96° test, at	4
3,500 bags Cuba centrifugals, basis 96° test, duty paid New York, at	4

It is to be noted that the cost, duty paid and delivered to the refinery, on all of this sugar was the same, i. e., 4 cents laid down at the refiners' wharf in New York. The Porto Rico and Louisiana sugar paid no duty. The Surinam sugar paid the full duty of 1.685 cents, so that the seller of this sugar only netted 2.315 cents for his product.

We have a preferential tariff with Cuba, which permits its sugar to be admitted at 20 per cent less than the regular rates of duty, so that the importation of the Cuban sugar, above referred to, paid a duty of 1.348 cents, the seller netting 2.652 cents per pound for his product as compared with the price of 2.315 cents netted by the seller of the San Domingo sugar, and of 4 cents obtained by the sellers of the Porto Rico and Louisiana sugars.

That our sugar costs the consumer the full amount of the tariff is shown clearly by the prices of sugar that obtained in New York during the three years the McKinley Act was in force, compared with the three years immediately preceding its enactment. In fact, if we study the daily market of sugar at New York for any number of years—last past—we will find that the sugar imported from countries where full duty was paid was purchased from day to day at a price which, together with the tariff, just equaled the price of sugar purchased the same day from our colonies or from the sugar producer here. Or, to reverse the statement, our domestic sugar and the sugar produced in our island possessions sold in New York for a price in excess of the sugar imported from foreign countries equal to the difference of our tariff. And this must always be true as long as our country and its islands do not produce approximately the amount of sugar that we consume. This country and Porto Rico, Hawaii, and the Philippines only produced last year about 47 per cent of the sugar that we actually consumed, of which the United States did not produce quite one-half. The sugar planters of Porto Rico, Hawaii, and the Philippine Islands receive the same protection as the growers of sugar in this country. They get the full benefit of our tariff so the consumers in this country pay for the island sugar $1.90 per hundred more than they could purchase sugar for in the open market if there were no tariff, just as they pay the extra price for the sugar grown here.

An examination of the results of the McKinley law, which I shall refer to at length, conclusively shows my contention is correct.

OUR ENORMOUSLY HEAVY TARIFF HAS BEEN A FAILURE IN FOSTERING THE SUGAR INDUSTRY, THOUGH THE EXPERIMENT IN NINETEEN YEARS HAS COST US $1,625,000,000.

At the time the McKinley law was enacted we established a policy of promoting by taxation the culture of sugar beets. Under the McKinley Act we imported free all sugar below No. 16 Dutch standard in color and gave 2 cents a pound bounty to the producers of sugar beets and sugar cane. During the four years that the McKinley law was in operation the Government paid in bounties the sum of $36,106,000, or approximately $9,000,000 a year.

When the Democratic Party came into power in 1894 it repealed the bounty on sugar and levied a tariff of 40 per cent ad valorem on all sugar imported except Hawaiian sugar. This tariff amounted to at least 1 cent a pound. During the three years that the Wilson Act of 1894 was in force we consumed 14,414,727,289 pounds, which cost us 1 cent a pound more than it would have otherwise cost us if we could have purchased our sugar in the open markets of the world. Had we no duty, the American people would have purchased their sugar for $144,000,000 less.

In 1897 the Dingley bill was enacted, increasing the tariff to 1.95 cents a pound, or increasing it to $1.95 a hundred pounds. The duty on sugar was reduced under the Payne-Aldrich bill to 1.9 cents a pound, or $1.90 per hundred. While the Dingley and Payne-Aldrich bills were in force, from 1897 to June 1, 1910, we consumed 76,037,820,168 pounds of sugar. This sugar cost the consumer $1.90 and $1.95 per hundred pounds more than it would have otherwise cost if we had purchased our sugar in the open markets of the world. To recapitulate, our sugar cost us during the four years the McKinley Act was in force $36,000,000 more than it would have cost had we purchased our sugar in the open market. During the three years the Wilson Act was in force, $144,000,000, and during the time the Dingley and Payne-Aldrich bills were in force, up to June 1, 1910, $1,444,718,583 more, making a total cost since the McKinley law went into effect of $1,624,824,583.

When I say the sugar cost us during this time $1,624,824,583 more than it would have cost us in the open market, I am figuring on the basis of the bounty we paid during the time the McKinley law was in effect and on the basis that every 100 pounds of domestic and imported sugar cost us the full tariff duty imposed on sugar the year that it was bought for consumption.

Now, I want to ask you, What have the people of this country to show for this enormous sum of money they have expended to promote the culture of sugar beets? What has it accomplished toward this end? In 1890, the date of the McKinley law, we raised of cane and beet sugar 306,000,000 pounds. This amount was increased in 1910 to 1,775,000,000 pounds. Or, our increased production amounted to 1,400,000,000 pounds. This may be said to be a large increase, but let us compare this with our increased consumption. In 1890 we consumed 3,192,000,000 pounds. In 1910 we consumed 7,360,000,000 pounds. So our increased production, brought about by our tariff in 20 years, amounted to 1,400,000,000 pounds, but our increased consumption amounted to more than 4,100,000,000 pounds. So by spending this enormous sum we have been able to foster the beet-sugar industry in this country to the extent of increasing our production 1 pound for every 3 pounds of our increased consumption. Will anyone contend that on this showing, even if we maintain our present enormous tariff, there is any hope or prospect of supplying our home market with home-grown sugar? On the contrary, does it not show our utter failure to promote the sugar-beet industry by this frightful tariff? What is there in this history to justify us in continuing the policy? I think that this short argument shows the utter failure of this tariff to promote this industry. While our enormously heavy tariff has failed wholly in the prime object for which it was created, it has succeeded in building up one of the greatest and most greedy monopolies that this country has ever known.

I have stated what our statistics clearly show it has cost this country to foster this industry up to the present time. It is an enormous amount. It may be claimed that the price of sugar is not increased by the amount of the tariff; that this is only a theory, and that if we reduced the tariff or took it off altogether the price would not be reduced a corresponding amount. Our experience during the McKinley law shows conclusively I am right. We have in this case an actual demonstration that my contention is correct.

The law in force just prior to the McKinley Act fixed the rate on sugar from 1¼ to 3½ cents per pound. The McKinley law provided that sugar should be imported free up to No. 16 Dutch standard, in color, and one-half a cent per pound above that. The McKinley bill was introduced in this House in the spring of 1890. In fact, it was well known in the business world for some months prior to that time that such a law was proposed and would probably be enacted. The McKinley Act went into force in October, 1891. By its provisions the schedule affecting sugar did not become operative until April 1, 1891; so for a year prior to the McKinley Act's taking effect it was known that such a law would probably be enacted and known to a certainty six months before it became operative. This had the effect for a full year or more before it became a law of reducing enormously the importations of sugar and consequently lowering the price of sugar generally at least 1 cent per pound during this time. During March and February, 1891, preceding the 1st of April, the price of sugar averaged about $6.13 a hundred. This was the price in New York on the 25th day of March, 1891. On the 1st day of April, 1891, when the McKinley Act took effect, sugar dropped to $4.50 per hundred, or dropped $1.63 per hundred pounds. In order to determine the effect of the McKinley law on the price of sugar I give below a table of prices for sugar that existed in New York for granulated sugar for three years immediately preceding April 1, 1891, the day the McKinley Act went into effect, and for three years immediately following April 1, 1891, showing the price of sugar on the dates as they appear in the table, the price being on the same dates, during each month in each year. This will show fairly, but not fully, the amount saved the consumers of this country by the McKinley law. It will be observed that the average price of sugar for the three years immediately preceding April 1, 1891, was $7.06 per hundred pounds. This amount would be at least 30 cents per hundred pounds more except for the effect of the McKinley law on sugar the year preceding its enactment, as I have mentioned.

The average price for sugar for the three years succeeding April 1 was $4.42 per hundred; or, the price of sugar for the three years immediately following the McKinley law was, on the market of New York, $2.42 per hundred less than the three years immediately preceding the date the McKinley law took effect. To better and more clearly show you the actual results of the McKinley law and its great saving to the people for the three years following the fiscal year beginning June 30, 1891, I want to give you its results in dollars and cents. During the three years mentioned this country consumed 13,117,000,000 pounds of sugar. By reason of removing the tariff on raw sugar and reducing it to one-half cent per pound on refined sugar by the McKinley Act there was saved to the consumers of this country 2.62 cents per pound, according to the market price in New York, for every pound consumed. Or, if we multiply 13,117,000,000 pounds by 2½ cents per pound we have $327,925,000 saved to the people of this country by the McKinley Act. The expenditures of our Government for the three years immediately following June 30, 1891, were $1,093,000,000. The reduction of tariff on sugar by the McKinley Act saved the people of the United States a sum equal to 30 per cent of this amount, or 30 per cent of the entire cost of running this Government during those three years.

If the McKinley law had provided for free sugar, refined or unrefined, the people during those three years would have saved $70,000,000 more. These figures which I have just given are not based on theory. They are not guesswork. They show exactly the saving that was made, and anyone can get the statistics and verify these figures if he desires to do so.

THE WORLD'S PRODUCTION AND CONSUMPTION OF SUGAR HAVE GROWN ENORMOUSLY DURING THE PAST 40 YEARS, WHILE THE PRICE HAS CONSTANTLY DECREASED.

The world's production of sugar, and likewise its consumption, have grown enormously and almost constantly from 1865 to the present time. In 1870 the world's production was over 5,000,000,000 pounds; in 1880, over 7,000,000,000 pounds; in 1890 it was over 12,000,000,000 pounds; and in 1910 it was over 33,000,000,000 pounds. While both the production and the consumption of sugar have increased enormously during this period, the price of sugar has constantly decreased. The United States Statistical Abstract shows that the average price at wholesale of sugar in foreign countries in 1870 was $4.95 per 100 pounds and in the United States $13.51 per 100 pounds. The tariff of 5 cents and our depreciated currency account for this difference. In 1880 the average cost of sugar in foreign countries was $4.18 and in the United States $9.80 per 100 pounds. In 1890—this is prior to the McKinley Act—the average cost of sugar in foreign countries was $3.28 per 100 pounds and in this country $6.27 per 100 pounds. In 1909—the latest figures that this abstract gives—foreign sugar was $2.30 per 100 pounds and in this country $4.76 per 100 pounds. While the price of foreign sugar has decreased constantly since the McKinley Act was repealed, in 1894, the price in this country has constantly increased over that during the McKinley Act—first under the Wilson Act and still more under the Dingley and Payne-Aldrich Acts. These facts are all the more remarkable when we stop to consider that the prices of all other food products have been on the increase rather than the decrease. While the consumption and the production have increased enormously, the amount of sugar raised can easily be doubled, as I will show, if the acreage should be increased from an acreage equal to two-fifths of the State of Iowa to four-fifths of that State. Is it not fair to suppose that these countries that now produce their sugar so cheaply will increase their acreage as fast as the demand for it increases?

CAN OUR TARIFF ON SUGAR BE DEFENDED ON THE GROUND THAT IT PRODUCES A LARGE REVENUE?

I do not believe that a tax on sugar can be justified on the ground that it produces a revenue. If we look upon it as a revenue producer, we can not defend it on the ground of a revenue producer unless the Government receives the benefit of it. I do not believe that we can justify a tariff on food products that are a necessity on the table of every man, rich or poor. Be that as it may, if we are going to tax the importation of sugar a penny, the Government ought to get that penny. If we are going to tax sugar $1.90 a hundred pounds the Government should get the $1.90.

The great trouble with our tariff of $1.90 per hundred on sugar, if we look at it from a revenue standpoint, is that the Government gets only a small portion of it, and every consumer of sugar pays the extra $1.90 for every 100 pounds of sugar, domestic or imported, that he consumes. It is true that the Government does receive $1.90 on every 100 pounds of sugar imported, but not one cent in taxes does the United States Treasury obtain from domestic sugar, which, by reason of this indefensible tariff schedule, is selling at $1.90 a hundred pounds higher than it would be if there were an open market. For instance, we consumed last year 7,360,000,000 pounds of sugar, which cost the consumer 1.9 of a cent more than it would have cost him if sugar had been on the free list. If we multiply this number of pounds we consumed by 1.9 of a cent, we find that our sugar cost us $139,000,000 more than it would have cost if sugar had been on the free list, of which sum the Government records show that it only received $52,000,000; or, in other words, it cost our people $139,000,000 in order that the Government might get a little over $52,000,000. That is to say that for every 52 cents the Government received as revenue it cost the people $1.39.

It is certainly bad enough to collect this $52,000,000 from a tax on sugar. How utterly indefensible, how utterly wrong it is to collect this sum in such a way and in such a manner, that every time a man pays 52 cents to the Government he must pay 87 cents additional for the benefit of those people engaged in the raising and manufacture of sugar, most of it going to the plantation owners of our island possessions and to the great Sugar Trust monopoly.

It is generally understood—and I do not doubt the truth of it—that the plantations in our island possessions, if not altogether, are largely in the hands of the great sugar monopoly, and who is the large beneficiary of this $87,000,000.

I do not think that it will be denied that a poor man and the man of moderate means and the ordinary workingman and their families consume practicaly as large a proportion of sugar consumed in this country as the rich man and his family does. The man who depends upon his wages for the care of his family finds it hard enough to feed, clothe, and educate them without being compelled to pay to the Sugar Trust and to the planters of our island possessions 87 cents every time he pays the Government 52 cents. Then, looking at this tariff from a revenue or a financial point of view, what can be more idiotic than this manner of collecting revenue? I think it far from wise to tax this food product, even though the Government got all the return from it; but what a useless and criminal waste of money to levy a tax of this kind on the people when the Government gets only 37½ per cent of the tax so imposed. If all of our $600,000,000—the revenue that we collect annually—were raised by a similar process, it would cost us more than one billion and a half annually to do so. We would soon become a bankrupt nation. Nothing but a change to a sane and wise method of raising our revenues could save us. Looking upon this tax, then, simply as a manner of raising revenue, it is an economical failure.

THE BEET-SUGAR INDUSTRY IN THIS COUNTRY WILL NEVER BE A PROFITABLE ONE.

I think I have demonstrated that this country has not been successful in promoting the production of beet sugar. Certainly we have nothing to show for it, when we stop to think of the enormous price we have paid for the small acreage of sugar beets produced. A brief study of the cost of production here and elsewhere will show clearly that we can never hope, even under the enormous tariff we now have, to produce but a small fraction of the amount we consume. Let us examine into this question briefly. The farmers receive $5 per ton for their sugar beets at the plant, according to our Government statistics. The owners of the sugar-beet factories tell us that they can not afford to pay more than $5 per ton for sugar beets at the prevailing prices for sugar. Our statisticians tell us that the sugar beets produced in this country for a period of five years averaged about 230 pounds of sugar for every ton of sugar beets. If a farmer receives $5 per ton for his sugar beets at the market, he receives about $2.18 for every 100 potential pounds of sugar in the beets. On the best authority, I am informed that beet sugar can be produced in Austria-Hungary for $1.85 per hundred and in Germany for $2 per hundred. Two dollars per hundred is about what England pays for her sugar, and that is what we pay for the 4,000,000,000 pounds we import. Then we add that to the custom duties and we have 4 cents per pound, the prevailing market in New York. If we remove the duty from sugar, instead of sugar retailing on the coast for about 12 pounds for a dollar and retailing in New York for about 14 to 20 pounds for a dollar, sugar would retail in the United States from 33 to 40 pounds for the dollar. In fact, we can buy our sugar, and do buy our sugar, in the open markets of the world for a less amount of money than the farmer gets for the potential sugar in the beets.

The manufacturer of the sugar beet insists that if he pays $5 per ton for beets he can not sell the manufactured sugar for less than 4 cents per pound. Then, on what theory do we expect to successfully and economically produce sugar in this country from sugar beets? Can anyone imagine that the farmer will raise the sugar beet and sell them for less than $5 per ton? Is land going to get cheaper in this country? Are we going to get our farm help cheaper? On what theory is it possible for us to produce sugar from our beets when we can not raise the beets as cheaply as we can buy the sugar abroad? It does cost large sums of money to build a sugar-beet factory. It does cost large sums of money to operate a factory of this kind. Someone must pay for this if we are going to manufacture it here. We can not economically do this when we can buy the sugar abroad for the same price that the farmer gets for his raw beets delivered at the sugar factory.

The major portion of the cost of raising sugar beets is hand labor, and we can no more hope to compete with Austria-Hungary and Germany and other beet-growing countries than we can hope to secure farm labor for $10 per month. Sugar is most cheaply produced in the Tropics, where cane grows. It is my opinion that sooner or later sugar-beet growing countries, even where beet sugar is produced most cheaply, are bound to yield to the cane-producing countries, because the cheapest sugar raised in the world is in the Tropics, where cane grows luxuriantly; and it takes but a small acreage, as I have shown, to produce the world's supply of sugar. Our sugar-beet growers can not hope to compete with the growers of sugar cane. We can no more hope to compete with them than the Arctic Ocean can compete with the Caribbean Sea in raising crocodiles.

THE FARMERS OF THIS COUNTRY WOULD NOT BE INJURED A PENNY IF NO SUGAR BEETS WERE RAISED.

It has been said that 100,000 farmers are producers of sugar and that to place sugar on the free list would result in driving those farmers out of this industry and work enormous hardships upon them. I certainly would not want, as a Member of this Congress or as an individual, to injure unnecessarily any man in any trade or profession. If sugar is placed on the free list it will not result in any such injury. The farmers engaged in the culture of sugar beets have invested in it nothing but the price of their land; they get nothing from it but the use of the land and the privilege of cultivating sugar beets, probably at a small profit, if at any profit at all. There is not an acre of land in the United States farmed to sugar beets that could not be as successfully farmed to something else, and with equal profit. If there was not a sugar beet raised in the United States the farmers' land on which sugar beets are now raised would be quite as valuable. In fact, the owners of the sugar-beet factories find it exceedingly difficult to get farmers to cultivate the sugar beet at the prices they pay for beets, and the owners claim that they are paying the farmer all that they can afford to do, in view of the prevailing price of sugar. The farmer raising sugar beets has no general market. His sole market is the price that he and the factory man agree that the farmer shall receive, and the owner of the plant never agrees upon a price that is very profitable to the farmer. The farmer can not sell the sugar beet on the open market, for there is no open market. There is just the one market for his sugar beet, and that is at the factory in his immediate vicinity.

The farmer raises about 10 tons of sugar beets to the acre, for which he receives $5 per ton, or $50 per acre. Ten dollars per acre will be a very large profit on this crop at this price, and probably the farmer does not receive that amount. It cost the people of this country last year more than $139,000,000 in order that 420,000 acres of land might be cultivated to sugar beets, for which the farmer received in gross about $50 an acre for his crop, or a possible $10 an acre profit. Then it cost the people of this country $139,000,000 that a few farmers might get $4,000,000 profit out of raising sugar beets. The farmers of this country comprise about one-third of the entire population, and they consume fully their one-third of the sugar and pay one-third of the tax. Thus, a few farmers received a possible profit of $4,000,000 at a cost to the balance of the farmers of one-third of $139,000,000, or $46,000,000; and each and every farmer knows without being told that a brother farmer who received only $5 a ton for beets will not lose a penny if he should be compelled to raise some other crop.

It cost the people of this country in 1910, $139,000,000 in order to get 420,000 acres cultivated in sugar beets. Or, it cost the people in the United States $322 in cash for every acre of sugar beets raised. The land cultivated to beet sugar would not be worth in the open market on an average more than $150 per acre. Would it not be better by far to pay every farmer $150 per acre for the land he cultivated to sugar beets last year and forever get rid of this losing proposition? We would have saved $172 last year on every acre of beets raised if we had paid the farmer the full value of every acre of land cultivated to beet sugar.

If necessary, it would be a good investment to buy every acre of land cultivated to beets, pay the cost of all our beet-sugar factories, estimated at $40,000,000 in value, and get rid of this frightful tax on sugar. We could buy every beet-sugar factory in existence in the United States, pay $150 per acre for every acre of land used to raise sugar beets, and have nearly $50,000,000 left out of the $139,000,000 that our beet-sugar industry costs us annually. It would be a far better proposition to do this than to keep on levying this enormous sum as a tax on our people.

The defenders of the present tariff on sugar base their argument largely on the ground that it would be a great hardship on the farmers of this country to reduce the tariff or entirely remove it, because it would drive them out of the business of raising sugar beets. To hear the defenders acclaim in its favor one would imagine that the industry is fast becoming a large and extensive one, and that California, Colorado, Michigan, Idaho, and many other States are devoting the major portion of their land to the culture of sugar beets, and that to reduce the tariff and drive these farmers from this industry would very materially depress, if not destroy, the prosperity of those States. One would imagine that a large part of the farm lands of those States was devoted to the culture of sugar beets. What is the truth about this? As I have stated, our Government statisticians tell us that last year 420,000 acres of land were cultivated to beets. This sounds like a large number of acres, but, in truth and fact, this acreage equals only about one-eightieth of the State of Iowa and about one four-hundredth of the State of Texas. So, if no beets were planted this year, an area of land equal to one four-hundredth of the State of Texas would have to be cultivated to corn, wheat, cotton, alfalfa, or some other farm product. If this acreage should all be planted to corn, I do not think it would affect the price of corn. If this acreage were planted entirely in cotton, do you think it would lower the price of cotton? If this acreage should be devoted to raising beef cattle, do you think it would reduce the price of meat?

Do you think the farmers of these States where beets are raised, if they were required to substitute their crop of beets to corn, wheat, barley, cotton, or the raising of grasses, such as alfalfa or timothy, would in any manner be injured by it? But, let us go further. If we were to continue to tax ourselves $139,000,000 per year to encourage the culture of sugar beets and finally succeeded in securing enough of an acreage devoted to the culture of sugar beets to supply our country with domestic sugar, how much of our cultivated land would be so used? Last year we consumed in this country 7,360,000,000 pounds of sugar. An average acre of sugar beets will produce 2,400 pounds of sugar. It will take 3,066,666 acres to produce 7,360,000,000 pounds. If every pound of sugar consumed by the people of the United States last year had been produced from beets grown in this country, they could all have been grown on an acreage equal to one-tenth of the State of Iowa or one-fifty-fifth of the State of Texas, and would have cost the people of this country $139,000,000 to secure that amount of land cultivated to the raising of sugar beets. If we were to grow enough sugar beets to supply the entire world with sugar, the comparative acreage would still be small. Last year there was consumed in the entire world 33,000,000,000 pounds of sugar. This amount could be produced from sugar beets grown on an acreage equal to two-fifths of the State of Iowa or two twenty-fifths of the State of Texas. I ask, in all seriousness, is not $139,000,000 too heavy a tax to be borne by the people of this country in order to secure an acreage of land cultivated to sugar beets equal to only one-eightieth of the State of Iowa or one four-hundredth of the State of Texas? Why should we tax ourselves one penny that this land might be farmed to sugar beets when it can be farmed equally as profitable to corn, wheat, cotton, alfalfa? Is it anything else than criminal for any great party to advocate such doctrine?

THE SUGAR TRUST IMPOSES AN EXTRA BURDEN ON THE PACIFIC COAST OF ABOUT 1 CENT A POUND.

The Pacific coast is especially interested in my proposed amendment to put sugar on the free list. We suffer more heavily by reason of the sugar tariff and the exaction that the Sugar Trust may and do make upon us than any other part of this country. This trust practically controls the whole output of sugar from the Hawaiian and Philippine Islands. That sugar from those islands, consumed on the Pacific coast, is brought direct to San Francisco, from whence it is distributed. The Pacific coast consumes about one-third of the sugar production of those two groups of islands. The remainder of the sugar is shipped to New York and Philadelphia by way of the Isthmus of Tehuantepec. On the west side of the isthmus it is unloaded from the boats onto a train and then transported to the east coast of the isthmus, unloaded from the cars and reloaded on ships, and then transported to New York and Philadelphia. The cost of shipping this sugar to the cities of Philadelphia and New York is far in excess of the cost of shipping it to San Francisco. In fact, I am credibly informed that the planters in the Hawaiian and Philippine Islands receive one-fourth of a cent less per pound for that portion of their sugar delivered at San Francisco than that delivered at Philadelphia and New York. So the sugar from these islands, bought and refined by the Sugar Trust in San Francisco, costs it one-fourth of a cent less per pound for raw sugar than the balance of the Hawaiian and Philippine sugar delivered to the same trust at New York and Philadelphia. Then they arbitrarily put a price of 50 to 75 cents more on this Hawaiian and Philippine sugar that they sell in San Francisco to the wholesalers than they charge the wholesalers in New York and Philadelphia for Hawaiian and Philippine sugar delivered to them at New York or Philadelphia, consequently the sugar grown almost in sight of San Francisco and transported by water to it costs the wholesalers of San Francisco 50 to 75 cents more per hundred pounds than the same sugar costs the wholesalers in New York and Philadelphia, when it costs the trust at least 25 cents less for sugar at San Francisco.

The people of the Pacific coast not only pay the $1.90 per hundred pounds imposed by the tariff, but it costs them about $1 more than it would cost except by reason of the monopoly that the Sugar Trust enjoys under the protection of our tariff. Our statisticians tell us that every man, woman, and child in this country consumes about 80 pounds of sugar a year. It costs the people of San Francisco about 3 cents per pound more than it would cost them if they could purchase their sugar in the open market of the world. It costs every man, woman, and child on the Pacific coast about $2.40 per year more for sugar than they legitimately should pay. There are certainly 10,000,000 people in the West affected in this way. In other words, the people in the western part of the United States are paying on account of this tariff and this discrimination a sum equal to about $24,000,000, or about one-half of the revenue that the Government derives on account of the tariff on sugar. We have about 1,200,000 people in my State. The tariff and this discrimintion cost the people of my own State about $3,000,000 per annum. This excess cost amounts to about as much as it takes to run our State government. It surely costs my people more than it does to maintain our two State colleges—with about 1,500 pupils in each institution—our three State normal schools, our asylums, our penal, reformatory, and charitable institutions, and the salary of our State officials. I venture to say that the tariff on sugar costs each and every State in this Union about as much as it costs to run its State government.

Under the Canadian reciprocal agreement and this proposed free list, or practically under the reciprocity agreement alone, you are taking from the great Northwest every penny of protection heretofore accorded it against foreign competition. There is nothing left upon which there is one penny of protection, as against the only people that can or do compete with them. You make us pay to the Sugar Trust, by reason of the tariff on sugar and its monopoly, made possible by the tariff, $10,000,000 more than a like number of people pay in the East or South, and this, too, for the sugar produced at our door.

PLACING SUGAR ON THE FREE LIST WILL MATERIALLY REDUCE THE HIGH COST OF LIVING.

The great and growing cry in this country is the high cost of living. It is a problem which concerns every man of family who is dependent upon his wages to support his family. It is the specter which awakens him in the morning; it sits with him at his breakfast; its dogs his footsteps all day long; it retires to bed with him at night to disturb his slumbers.

To remedy this, to reduce as far as possible the cost of living, is the problem of the day. To remedy this, as far as it is within the power of this Congress to do, is our plain duty. It is no easy task. Your reciprocity bill will not do it; the passage of this free-list bill I do not believe will accomplish this to any great extent. I do not believe that the passage of this bill will reduce the cost materially of any of the necessary food products. Its tendency, I believe and hope, will be in that direction. But you can reduce the cost of living. You will reduce the cost of living very materially if you adopt the amendment I propose. By this one act you will lessen the price of sugar at least 2 cents a pound. This would lessen, and lessen very materially, the cost of living to every family in America. It is the one amendment that you can make to our revenue law that will immediately and very materially reduce the cost of living to everyone.

Sugar is one of the actual necessities of life. There is scarcely any other article that goes on the poor man's table that another food can not be found as a substitute. There are substitutes for other foods, but nothing can take the place of sugar. Sugar is not a luxury to the rich, but it is to the poor man. To my mind there is no tax levied on any article of food produced that is as indefensible and as utterly wrong as the tax on sugar.

It has been said that the tax on sugar produces $52,000,000 of revenue, and what will you do about it? It does produce $52,000,000, but that is no evidence that it is just or right. If it does produce $52,000,000 revenue, as a consequence there are 52,000,000 reasons why it should be changed.

This tax is not levied fairly on the people of this country. It rests alike heavily upon the poor, and the very poor, as well as upon the rich. It is not a tax placed on the people of this country in proportion to their wealth. You say we will lose $52,000,000 revenue. I confess it, but in doing so you will relieve the great masses of this country from paying this $52,000,000. You can shift the tax of $52,000,000 from the shoulders of the people who bear it to the shoulders of the people who ought to bear it.

The great masses of the people—the farmer, the mechanic, the clerk in the store, the workingman—are the people who pay the great proportion of this. You can save them this $52,000,000, collected as a tax on sugar, and in doing so you will also save them the additional sum of $86,000,000 that now, very largely, goes to the sugar planters and growers of Hawaii, Porto Rico, and the Philippine Islands, and to the great sugar monopoly that controls this industry. One hundred and thirty-nine million dollars is an enormous sum to save the great masses of people of this country. It is a sum equal to nearly one-fourth of the entire expense of operating this Government. Nothing you can do will come so near to being a blessing to every poor man and every man of moderate means as placing sugar on the free list.

This country is rich; it is not impoverished. We can find some way to raise this $52,000,000 revenue without taxing sugar. We had better increase the excise tax on corporations. If we can not do it any other way, you can save $52,000,000. Your Democratic Party during the last campaign denounced the Republican Party for its extravagance in operating the Government, and you have promised the people of the country that you would save them an enormous sum when the Democratic Party got into power. If you discount 50 per cent the promises that you have solemnly made this country with reference to retrenchment and reduction in the cost of running this Government, you can easily save over $52,000,000, and you will not need this tax on sugar. Fifty-two million dollars is about 8 per cent of the cost to run our Government under a Republican administration this last year. Can you return to your constituents, in the face of the promises you have made, and say to them, "We could not place sugar on the free list because we could not save 8 per cent of what the Republican Party appropriated this last year for the cost of running the Government"? Do you think the majority of voters who gave you the splendid majority you have on that side of the House understood that you could not by rigid economy save 8 per cent of the cost of running this Government? What did you mean when you said that the Republican Party had been enormously extravagant? Did you mean that the Republicans were spending only 8 per cent more than was enough to operate the Government? Is there only 8 per cent difference between the enormously extravagant Republican administration and a most frugal Democratic one?

When you say that this farmers' free list of 100 items will greatly relieve the farmers to the extent of at least $10,000,000, I want to say that if you amend this bill by adding the one item of sugar that I propose, you will relieve the farmers alone of $46,000,000 annually, and the rest of the people of this country, who are equally deserving, of $93,000,000 more. If your $10,000,000 reduction is a good thing, why is not a reduction of $139,000,000 more a great deal better? If it is a good thing to take the tariff off of "hoop and band iron or hoop and band steel, punched or unpunched," why is it not equally as good to take it off of sugar? There are a mighty few people in this country who make much use of or purchase "hoop or band steel" whether it is "punched or unpunched," but every one of our 93,000,000 people use sugar every day.

Why should the farmer who raises wheat, corn, cotton, or cattle be taxed for the benefit of the planters in Porto Rico, Hawaii, and the Philippine Islands? Or, to be accurate, why should he be taxed about 2 cents per pound for sugar that the Sugar Trust might exploit Porto Rico and our island possessions? It must be remembered all the time that the sugar grower and the manufacturer in those islands have the same protection under our tariff law as the producer of beet or cane sugar here has. It must also be remembered that these islands produced last year 100,000,000 pounds more of sugar than were produced in the United States. Sugar cane grows as naturally and abundantly in our island possessions as corn does in the great Central West and as cotton does in the South. Why should the grower of corn, wheat, or cotton be compelled to compete with the world in the sale of his crop and be compelled to pay nearly double the price for the sugar he buys from our island possessions than he can buy it for in the open market?

The farmer who raises our corn and wheat pays the highest wages for farm labor paid anywhere in the whole world, and why should he be compelled to sell his crop in the open market of the world and pay a bounty to our sugar growers in the islands, who employ coolie labor in Porto Rico and the Philippine Islands and Jap labor in Hawaii? Must a man who works in the shops and factories be charged 2 cents per pound more for his sugar than he otherwise could buy it in order to give employment to Japs in Hawaii and coolie labor in our other island possessions? We all want to see our island possessions grow rich and prosperous, but the people of this country ought not to be taxed that the farms in those islands may be cultivated to a crop which grows naturally and abundantly there, and where sugar can be produced as cheaply as in any other part of the world.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.
